THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers.
NUMBER NINETY-EIGHT CHESNUT ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

EDMUND DEACON, HENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

} ONE DOLLAR per annum when taken in Clubs of 10, and a paper gratis to the person getting up the Club. {

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXVIII. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1848. WHOLE NO. 1408.

Original Pictures of Life.

THE

PET FROM THE POOR HOUSE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST,

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS,

AUTHOR OF "MALINA GRAY," "DAVID HUNT," ETC., ETC.

[ENTERED ACCORDING TO ACT OF CONGRESS, IN THE YEAR 1848, BY DEACON & PETERSON, IN THE CLERK'S OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT COURT, OF THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.]

CONTINUED.

CHAPTER VII.

In his foot! with the spider lew—
At bloom and black was he,
And he said he's seen pass that way.
With a quiver of horrid glee!

A few mornings before the little birth-day party described in our last chapter, two men were seen to enter the Mayor's Office, accompanied by the Alderman of the Nineteenth Ward. The Mayor was alone in his private room, and the Alderman left his two companions in the outer office while he held a moment's private conversation with his honor. There was a sort of boisterous exultation in the Alderman's manner, which rather displeased the Mayor, who looked upon the exhibition of any feeling as a weakness, but he received his friend with his usual bland smile, and requested him to be seated.

The Alderman drew his leathern cushioned seat close to the Mayor, and laid his broad red hand on his honor's knee.

"They are here—both the witnesses are here—ready to enter a complaint—I told you they were just the men to suit this Chester!"

"Here!" said the Mayor, "my friend—my good fellow—you should not have brought the witnesses here. In all these doubtful cases—do you understand?—I never receive a direct complaint. It must come through the Chief of Police. This one especially. He must call upon me officially to act!"

"Th—chief!" exclaimed the Alderman, in disdain, "why Chester is one of his especial pets. It will never do to entrust the business with him."

"Oh, have no fear. His duty forces him to present the complaint, once entered before him. Further than that, he has no power, no voice in the matter. It rests by law with the Mayor since, he is judge—jury. He is the law in these cases, you know."

"Then you think we may venture the case with the chief?" said the Alderman, still doubtful. "He will do all in his power to save Chester, I am certain."

"Of course he will—his power! He has no right even to hear the evidence, unless I desire it. His interference is a mere form—but it has a good appearance—half these fellows know nothing about the law, and when we break them it costs some of the cellars on hook. It gives him an appearance of responsibility, but does not partake of power. Take your witnesses to the chief—to the chief, my dear fellow, and leave the rest to me—to the law."

And so the Alderman of the Nineteenth joined his witnesses, and went to the chief's office. And from that office, twenty-four hours after, was sent the letter which Chester received on the night of his birth-day.

The trial day came. Within the railing of the chief's office sat his honor, the Mayor, calmly shaving down the point of a pencil, which he tried from time to time on a sheet of paper that lay on the desk before him. At his elbow was the clerk, with a quire of foolscap neatly arranged, and holding a pen ready in his hand. In a little room back of the office sat the Chief of Police—he partly screened from the vulgar gaze by the circumference of a comfortable office chair, and his jovial, good humored countenance somewhat clouded with anxiety for the fate of the noble young man on trial, for he had learned both to love and respect the accused. His presence was evidently disturbing to his honor, who dreaded the shrewd observation, the keen knowledge of men and things which so admirably fitted the chief for his position. He would rather have encountered the whole bar of New York, than the keen, but apparently careless scrutiny of this one man. But there sat the chief just within the shadow of his private closet, his ruddy wrought star of office glittering on his broad chest, and linked to his garments by a chain of massive gold—the walls behind him garnished with heavy oaken clubs, highly polished—hand cuffs and iron shackles, with various other grim analogies at his office, and these the chief seemed determined to remain during the whole of that suspicious trial. In vain the Mayor shifted and coughed in his chair. In vain he turned his cold and repelling look toward the immovable chief. You might have seen a covert smile and—and then gleam in the eyes of that obstinate functionary, but other than he seemed profoundly unconscious that his presence was in the least disagreeable. The Mayor did not venture upon the unprecedented step of requiring him to withdraw, so after a good deal of meaningless delay the trial went on.

Chester stood without the railing which encircled the Mayor and his clerk. His air was firm, his countenance calm, and almost haughty. He seemed to await the proceedings with quiet indifference. Behind him stood the two men whom he had followed from the liquor store on the night of his fall, and in a corner of the office sat Jones, the liquor dealer, and two or three persons entirely unknown to Chester.

The Mayor lifted his eyes, but they glanced beyond Chester. With all his coolness he had not the nerve to look directly into the piercing and searching eyes beat so calmly on him.

"Is your counsel here, Mr. Chester?" inquired his honor.

"I am here, speaking as other counsel, if I am to have a fair trial," replied Chester, firmly.

"I hope you do no doubt that your trial will be a fair one!" said the Mayor, sharpening his pencil afresh, for he wanted some occupation for his eyes.

Chester smiled, and in his smile there was no much reproachful scorn, that the Mayor felt it witness turning his glance this way.

"I am waiting," said Chester, "I am waiting for proof of the charges that have been preferred against me!"

Then, at a sign from the Mayor, came forth the man Smith, and they placed him under oath—Chester's eyes were upon him, as he touched the book, and the man turned visibly pale. But on his false oath—for the man perjured himself in the first sentence—he gained more courage. "Chester," he said, "had entered the liquor store, where he and his friend—" here the man pointed to his accomplice, "were quietly passing an hour before going to fulfil an engagement. Here he spent perhaps half an hour, drinking brandy and water, by the stove. Jones, he had noticed him particularly, knowing it to be against the law for policemen to indulge in drinking while on duty. The witness went out with his companions, leaving Chester by the stove, evidently much affected by what he had drunk. As he and his companions stood beneath an old tree, that grew in front of the liquor store, Chester came forth, reeling in his walk, and after a vain effort to maintain his foothold, fell upon the pavement, wholly intoxicated. Several other persons saw him in this position, but the witness and his friend had led him home, constituting him out to the care of his wife."

It was a plausible property, and several innocent persons came forward to strengthen it. They had seen Chester down upon the cellar, they had been held close in his accomplice's hand, and who in intuition of wrong, they corroborated the tumultuous story that was to destroy a good name.

Chester stood by as this story was artfully strengthened by the sweet-toned and subtle questions of the Mayor. His face was very pale, and he trembled from head to foot with honest and deep anger—nay, he felt something of horror, something manifest, in the sum of cold-blooded craft, and unflinching perjury that had been brought to bear upon him. There was something sublime in his pale silence, as he allowed witness after witness to pass from the box unchallenged—unquestioned. And all this false perjury the clerk registered down, and the Alderman of the Nineteenth Ward stood by to hear.

Then Chester was called upon for his defence. He stood upright grasping the railing with his right hand, his voice rang low and deep-toned as a bell, it made the Mayor start with the clear, search ing accents. He told the truth, the simple, natural truth, as it has been given to the reader, but with an eloquence, an energy which the pen has no power to describe.

"That man," he said, turning as he stood, and pointing his finger at the perjured Smith, "that man—let him step forward and tell the story he has sworn to, with his face lifted to mine, eye to eye, with the man he accuses. If he can do this—I am not other defence. Let him say what it is that has instigated him to heap this foul wrong upon an innocent man, what is to be his reward—whose danger and more subtle enemy he is seeking out! Let him but speak of these things with his eye looking into mine and I am content."

The crafty Jones had stood out back on Chester's side as a bird gazes upon the eye of a serpent. he could not look elsewhere—his face, his very mouth were white, he trembled from head to foot—not a sound tugging at his evil heart had well nigh dislodged both the truth, but the cold face near to the Mayor drove it back again even from his pallid lips.

"The witness has told his story under oath—others have substantiated it. You should have questioned him them. There is no reason why he should undergo a second examination."

This speech had its desired effect. Smith drew a deep breath, and putting on an air of dogged bravado, looked round at his companions like a man, if who had been just rescued from a fight that threatened to destroy him. The Mayor fell to sharpening his pencil again, and the Alderman made an effort to open a little gate in a corner of the railing, and would have approached his honor but for the constant frowning with which his attempt to open the gate was received by that prudent functionary, who felt that any appearance of understanding even with the Alderman, might be perilous while the chief sat regarding the proceedings with such real interest and apparent unconcern.

"And have you nothing else to offer—no witnesses?" said the Mayor, addressing Chester.

"None!" answered Chester, wiping the drops from his forehead. "I have told the truth, it that not believed all the witnesses on earth would do of no avail."

Then came from an outer chamber, hung with gilded stars, firemen's banners, and gated by the iron chest of a cell where chaste prisoners are sometimes locked, a little figure, him backed and stepped nickly footsteps.

"Mary, my poor child!" said Chester, but she only lifted her large eyes to his an instant, and going up to the railing held to it by her hand.

"May I be sworn as those men have been?" she said, addressing the startled Mayor in the same sweet tones that had claimed his compassion a month before.

"You! what can you know of the matter?" said his honor sharply, and almost thrown off his guard.

"Not much, but something I do know!" answered the child meekly. "May I speak?"

"But you are too young—how old are you?" cried the Mayor, hoping to have found a legal reason for sending away the obtrusive little imp, as he called the child in his heart.

"I am twelve, sir. Just twelve!"

The Mayor cast an uneasy glance at the chief's chair and then at the child.

"No," said Chester, "I do not know what this poor child wishes to say, but it is my wish that she be heard."

"If she is offered as a witness there is no dispute her right to speak," replied his honor, but with a disturbed countenance—and taking a little worn Bible, marked with a broad cross from the desk before him, his honor held it toward the child.

She took the Bible between both her hands and pressed her lips reverently upon it.

"Now," said the Mayor, "what do you wish to say?"

"It was so still out yonder where I waited by the door, for poor Mr. Chester was so anxious, I thought perhaps some one here might give me good news to carry home."

"This has nothing to do with the matter, child."

"I know," replied the little girl, meeting the Mayor's rebuff with her sweet humility. "But I thought perhaps you might ask how I came by the door. Well, sir, I heard what these men said about Mr. Chester. I know their voices, sir, for I heard them before, on the very night they were talking about it, as they stood under the great elm tree, standing in Mr. Chester to come out."

"The great elm tree—and how came you there, Mary?" exclaimed Chester, greatly surprised by the child's appearance.

"Do you remember, sir, that you were complaining and quiet at that sleep seemed to come? Mrs. Chester told me—I know about home, sir," continued the child, troubled that it was her duty to address the Mayor. "She sat up together sewing, and after he went out I saw the tears come into Mrs. Chester's eyes, and more at times they fell upon her work. She was crying because her husband—oh if you only knew how good he is—was obliged to go out in such bitter cold weather, when his cough was coming on again. I saw what she was feeling about, and so as he had been too ill to get supper, I asked her to let me make a cup of warm coffee and carry it out to him on his beat. She would not let me make the coffee, but the idea pleased her and she made it herself, and poured it out in a covered pitcher, while I put on a hood and shawl. I knew the way, sir, and was not in the least afraid of the night or anything else, for the stars were out and nobody ever thinks of harming a little girl like me. Some pity, and some laugh—but I am never afraid of being hurt even in the dark. I said this to Mrs. Chester, for she did not like to have me go out alone. She kissed me and said I might go, for that she was sure to take care of me anywhere. Well, sir, I went on, up one street and down another very slow, for the ice was slippery. When I saw Mr. Chester standing on a corner as I looking toward the windows of a store, and which was a great elm tree all dripping with ice—I know him by the way he stood and by his step which stone in the moonlight. Just as I was crossing over the street, with my pitcher of coffee, I saw a little boy come out from under the tree and speak to Mr. Chester, who ran over and went into the store.

"I knew that Mr. Chester would not stay long in that place, and so crept close up to the trunk of the tree, on the shady side, and holding the coffee under my shawl to keep it warm, waited for him to come out. There had been some noise in the store, as if people were quarrelling, but all that died away, and then two men came out and stopped close by the tree where I was standing. I kept still as a mouse, and pressed close up to the dark side, for the men were laughing, and I was afraid they might laugh at me if I came into the light. I heard every word that they said, sir, but did not know the meaning of it till now.

"'We have got him at last—Jones saw him take the money,' said one.

"'Yes, he did not drink it; Jones cannot say that.' It was another voice that made this answer, sir.

"'But he will say that or anything else likely to get the fellow out of the way—and so must you, sir,' so will I,' answered the loudest voice again.

"'Just then Mr. Chester came out of the store. He looked very pale, but I thought it was only the moonlight striking on him through the ice that hung all over the elm tree.

"'Now!' said one of the men, 'now is the your foot ready if he comes this way.' Mr. Chester did come that way, walking as fast as he could, sir, for the men, I should have gone up to him and spoke—I did not like to let them see me, and so waited a little, meaning to follow him when they were gone, and give him the coffee. He passed close by me, sir, and fell. I heard the men laugh—it—so low just as he came up. I heard the men laugh, and saw other people come up.

"'They lifted him from the ice—these two men—and held his face up to the cold air. I thought that he was dead, his face shone so white, and I somehow felt that thought harden my heart so I could not speak nor move. Everything went dark around me. I left the coffee pitcher slip from my hand and break upon the stones, but could not even try to save it. He had been so kind to me—there was only one thought come to me—I wish the cold—they would take him home and to his wife—she who had been so kind to me also. I knew it would break her heart, and still I could not move. When I did get a little strength, these men were going down the street, and Mr. Chester walked between them. I followed after, but the fright had made me weak, and my eyes were so full of tears that I could only see them moving before me like people in a fog.

"'By before I reached the house, two men—the same men had gone home with Mr. Chester—they were by me walking very fast and laughing. I heard them at the laugh, for they gave me no time to look up. I hoped by that to find Mr. Chester not so badly hurt as he seemed. This time more strength, and I got home sooner than I would have done. When I went in, Mr. Chester sat by the fire trembling like a leaf, and his wife stood over him bathing his head, paler than I ever saw her before at since!"

The little girl paused here, her eyes fell, and her cheek glowed as her lips, for she saw that one, sweeping a smile, peculiar to the Mayor, compressing his upper lip—and it struck a chill to her heart.

"Did you see the faces of those men—can you swear to them again?" questioned the Mayor.

"I did not see their faces plain enough to know them again, but by the voice of that man," and she pointed toward Smith, "I am sure he was one of them!"

"But this is all you know?" said the Mayor.

"It is all!" was the faint reply. "It is all!" and the child crept to the side of Chester, and put her hand in his.

He pressed that little hand, looking down kindly on her, and then her tears began to flow.

The Mayor drew a sheet of paper toward the inkstand, and prepared to withdraw. The clerk rolled up his minutes, and the witnesses went out, as soon to gain a secret that had been made evident to all but Chester and the Mayor.

Chester stood alone in the office, holding little Mary by the hand, when the chief came out from his closet, leaning very grave, but with much friendly sympathy in his manner. He wrung Chester's hand, and turned to the little girl, who Chester thought, not speak. His firm lips began to quiver, and—turning himself upon a chair, he rest his arms over the railing, his face full upon them, and the proud, stronged man sobbed like a child.

What is all the coldness and falsehood of his enemies but failed to cry, was accomplished by the words of soothed and sympathy. These alone had power to wring tears from his firm manhood, and Chester had come his little protege with a heavy heart, and a heavy, heavy heart was that which met his gaze as the little Mary of carelessness, and he entered the home where his wife sat weeping, and watching for him.

CHAPTER VIII.

[illegible] would be the lot of great or wise
Have an [illegible] in the [illegible]
The [illegible] poverty, to grow and grace,
[illegible] never need have been
[illegible] and wages for the poor man's life.
Are from the good to weaker, and despised.

During six long weeks did the Mayor of New York keep Chester in suspense, and all that time the heart-sickness man had no means of support, save that derived from the labor of his wife. Day and night her gentle woman sat toiling at her needle—the smile upon her lip chasing the tear from her eye. Her sympathy was all given to the husband of her choice. She was grieved and indignant at the wrong that had been done to him. She was a generous and feminine woman, but her sense of justice was powerful, and her feelings of indignation—strong against any man who could violate the bonds of common equity where should hold sway—her to neighbor.

With that keen, intuitive sense that belongs to thoughtful womanhood, her conviction settled at once on the man from whom her husband had received the despised wrong. Great love would almost be proof of divination, and with all his craft the Mayor failed to deceive one pure hearted and true woman. She knew that he was her husband's enemy, and blame her not, reader, if you have suffered similar wrong, if you have come up against this man, she could not think of him without an indignant glow of heart and cheek. She could not hear his name without a chill of dislike. She saw her husband's cheek grow paler each day—she saw his step grow more slow and weaker. In the night time his hollow cough would start her from the brief slumber into which she had fallen. Then would the tears of this, his unprovoked and relentless enemy rise before her mind, and her soul turned shuddering from the image.

I know that it is a Christian duty to forgive—but when a bad man omitted one defenceless chest, we are taught to offer the other to his upraised hand. But the Lord of Heaven and earth promises no forgiveness of transgression, unless it is followed by repentance; and where God himself draws the strict line between Justice and Mercy, let no merely human being be censured for withholding forgiveness to an unrepented wrong. Forgiveness is mercy, but mercy is not always justice, or a duty, and a sweet one to the noble of heart. But without atonement—that soul offering of the sinful—let no man hope to receive from his fellow what it is—Justice withholds. While we have tongue—while the Lord, let the great wisdom decide upon the duties of forgiveness also!

And so with an aching heart Mrs. Chester saw her husband sinking before her. His spirit remained firm but sorrowful; the shadow lay upon it, but his body, being the weaker, gave way, and confusion, suspense was devouring his strength like a demon. Chester knew that day by he might be called up before that man, branded with the drunkard's infamy, and cast forth with a sullied character and broken health to the mercies of humanity. It was that thought that clung around him night and day, deepening his cough, hollowing out his eyes, and visibly burning down his stately form.

Still Mrs. Chester worked on, and by her side, calm and sweet on her beautiful gratitude, might always be seen the little Mary, toiling also, and strengthened by the sweet-toned and subtle questions of the Mayor. His face was very pale, and he trembled from head to foot with honest and deep anger—nay, he felt something of horror, something manifest, in the sum of cold-blooded craft, and unflinching perjury that had been brought to bear upon him. There was something sublime in his pale silence, as he allowed witness after witness to pass from the box unchallenged—unquestioned. And all this false perjury the clerk registered down, and the Alderman of the Nineteenth Ward stood by to hear.

Then Chester was called upon for his defence. He stood upright grasping the railing with his right hand, his voice rang low and deep-toned as a bell, it made the Mayor start with the clear, search ing accents. He told the truth, the simple, natural truth, as it has been given to the reader, but with an eloquence, an energy which the pen has no power to describe.

"That man," he said, turning as he stood, and pointing his finger at the perjured Smith, "that man—let him step forward and tell the story he has sworn to, with his face lifted to mine, eye to eye, with the man he accuses. If he can do this—I am not other defence. Let him say what it is that has instigated him to heap this foul wrong upon an innocent man, what is to be his reward—whose danger and more subtle enemy he is seeking out! Let him but speak of these things with his eye looking into mine and I am content."

The crafty Jones had stood out back on Chester's side as a bird gazes upon the eye of a serpent. he could not look elsewhere—his face, his very mouth were white, he trembled from head to foot—not a sound tugging at his evil heart had well nigh dislodged both the truth, but the cold face near to the Mayor drove it back again even from his pallid lips.

"The witness has told his story under oath—others have substantiated it. You should have questioned him them. There is no reason why he should undergo a second examination."

This speech had its desired effect. Smith drew a deep breath, and putting on an air of dogged bravado, looked round at his companions like a man, if who had been just rescued from a fight that threatened to destroy him. The Mayor fell to sharpening his pencil again, and the Alderman made an effort to open a little gate in a corner of the railing, and would have approached his honor but for the constant frowning with which his attempt to open the gate was received by that prudent functionary, who felt that any appearance of understanding even with the Alderman, might be perilous while the chief sat regarding the proceedings with such real interest and apparent unconcern.

"And have you nothing else to offer—no witnesses?" said the Mayor, addressing Chester.

"None!" answered Chester, wiping the drops from his forehead. "I have told the truth, it that not believed all the witnesses on earth would do of no avail."

Then came from an outer chamber, hung with gilded stars, firemen's banners, and gated by the iron chest of a cell where chaste prisoners are sometimes locked, a little figure, him backed and stepped nickly footsteps.

"Mary, my poor child!" said Chester, but she only lifted her large eyes to his an instant, and going up to the railing held to it by her hand.

"May I be sworn as those men have been?" she said, addressing the startled Mayor in the same sweet tones that had claimed his compassion a month before.

"You! what can you know of the matter?" said his honor sharply, and almost thrown off his guard.

"Not much, but something I do know!" answered the child meekly. "May I speak?"

"But you are too young—how old are you?" cried the Mayor, hoping to have found a legal reason for sending away the obtrusive little imp, as he called the child in his heart.

"I am twelve, sir. Just twelve!"

The Mayor cast an uneasy glance at the chief's chair and then at the child.

"No," said Chester, "I do not know what this poor child wishes to say, but it is my wish that she be heard."

"If she is offered as a witness there is no dispute her right to speak," replied his honor, but with a disturbed countenance—and taking a little worn Bible, marked with a broad cross from the desk before him, his honor held it toward the child.

She took the Bible between both her hands and pressed her lips reverently upon it.

"Now," said the Mayor, "what do you wish to say?"

"It was so still out yonder where I waited by the door, for poor Mr. Chester was so anxious, I thought perhaps some one here might give me good news to carry home."

"This has nothing to do with the matter, child."

"I know," replied the little girl, meeting the Mayor's rebuff with her sweet humility. "But I thought perhaps you might ask how I came by the door. Well, sir, I heard what these men said about Mr. Chester. I know their voices, sir, for I heard them before, on the very night they were talking about it, as they stood under the great elm tree, standing in Mr. Chester to come out."

"The great elm tree—and how came you there, Mary?" exclaimed Chester, greatly surprised by the child's appearance.

"Do you remember, sir, that you were complaining and quiet at that sleep seemed to come? Mrs. Chester told me—I know about home, sir," continued the child, troubled that it was her duty to address the Mayor. "She sat up together sewing, and after he went out I saw the tears come into Mrs. Chester's eyes, and more at times they fell upon her work. She was crying because her husband—oh if you only knew how good he is—was obliged to go out in such bitter cold weather, when his cough was coming on again. I saw what she was feeling about, and so as he had been too ill to get supper, I asked her to let me make a cup of warm coffee and carry it out to him on his beat. She would not let me make the coffee, but the idea pleased her and she made it herself, and poured it out in a covered pitcher, while I put on a hood and shawl. I knew the way, sir, and was not in the least afraid of the night or anything else, for the stars were out and nobody ever thinks of harming a little girl like me. Some pity, and some laugh—but I am never afraid of being hurt even in the dark. I said this to Mrs. Chester, for she did not like to have me go out alone. She kissed me and said I might go, for that she was sure to take care of me anywhere. Well, sir, I went on, up one street and down another very slow, for the ice was slippery. When I saw Mr. Chester standing on a corner as I looking toward the windows of a store, and which was a great elm tree all dripping with ice—I know him by the way he stood and by his step which stone in the moonlight. Just as I was crossing over the street, with my pitcher of coffee, I saw a little boy come out from under the tree and speak to Mr. Chester, who ran over and went into the store.

"I knew that Mr. Chester would not stay long in that place, and so crept close up to the trunk of the tree, on the shady side, and holding the coffee under my shawl to keep it warm, waited for him to come out. There had been some noise in the store, as if people were quarrelling, but all that died away, and then two men came out and stopped close by the tree where I was standing. I kept still as a mouse, and pressed close up to the dark side, for the men were laughing, and I was afraid they might laugh at me if I came into the light. I heard every word that they said, sir, but did not know the meaning of it till now.

"'We have got him at last—Jones saw him take the money,' said one.

"'Yes, he did not drink it; Jones cannot say that.' It was another voice that made this answer, sir.

"'But he will say that or anything else likely to get the fellow out of the way—and so must you, sir,' so will I,' answered the loudest voice again.

"'Just then Mr. Chester came out of the store. He looked very pale, but I thought it was only the moonlight striking on him through the ice that hung all over the elm tree.

"'Now!' said one of the men, 'now is the your foot ready if he comes this way.' Mr. Chester did come that way, walking as fast as he could, sir, for the men, I should have gone up to him and spoke—I did not like to let them see me, and so waited a little, meaning to follow him when they were gone, and give him the coffee. He passed close by me, sir, and fell. I heard the men laugh—it—so low just as he came up. I heard the men laugh, and saw other people come up.

"'They lifted him from the ice—these two men—and held his face up to the cold air. I thought that he was dead, his face shone so white, and I somehow felt that thought hardened my heart so I could not speak nor move. Everything went dark around me. I left the coffee pitcher slip from my hand and break upon the stones, but could not even try to save it. He had been so kind to me—there was only one thought come to me—I wish the cold—they would take him home and to his wife—she who had been so kind to me also. I knew it would break her heart, and still I could not move. When I did get a little strength, these men were going down the street, and Mr. Chester walked between them. I followed after, but the fright had made me weak, and my eyes were so full of tears that I could only see them moving before me like people in a fog.

"'By before I reached the house, two men—the same men had gone home with Mr. Chester—they were by me walking very fast and laughing. I heard them at the laugh, for they gave me no time to look up. I hoped by that to find Mr. Chester not so badly hurt as he seemed. This time more strength, and I got home sooner than I would have done. When I went in, Mr. Chester sat by the fire trembling like a leaf, and his wife stood over him bathing his head, paler than I ever saw her before at since!"

The little girl paused here, her eyes fell, and her cheek glowed as her lips, for she saw that one, sweeping a smile, peculiar to the Mayor, compressing his upper lip—and it struck a chill to her heart.

"Did you see the faces of those men—can you swear to them again?" questioned the Mayor.

"I did not see their faces plain enough to know them again, but by the voice of that man," and she pointed toward Smith, "I am sure he was one of them!"

"But this is all you know?" said the Mayor.

"It is all!" was the faint reply. "It is all!" and the child crept to the side of Chester, and put her hand in his.

He pressed that little hand, looking down kindly on her, and then her tears began to flow.

The Mayor drew a sheet of paper toward the inkstand, and prepared to withdraw. The clerk rolled up his minutes, and the witnesses went out, as soon to gain a secret that had been made evident to all but Chester and the Mayor.

Chester stood alone in the office, holding little Mary by the hand, when the chief came out from his closet, leaning very grave, but with much friendly sympathy in his manner. He wrung Chester's hand, and turned to the little girl, who Chester thought not speak. His firm lips began to quiver, and—turning himself upon a chair, he rest his arms over the railing, his face full upon them, and the proud, stronged man sobbed like a child.

What is all the coldness and falsehood of his enemies but failed to cry, was accomplished by the words of soothed and sympathy. These alone had power to wring tears from his firm manhood, and Chester had come his little protege with a heavy heart, and a heavy, heavy heart was that which met his gaze as the little Mary of carelessness, and he entered the home where his wife sat weeping, and watching for him.

Still Mrs. Chester worked on, and by her side, calm and sweet on her beautiful gratitude, might always be seen the little Mary, toiling also, and strengthened by the sweet-toned and subtle questions of the Mayor. His face was very pale, and he trembled from head to foot with honest and deep anger—nay, he felt something of horror, something manifest, in the sum of cold-blooded craft, and unflinching perjury that had been brought to bear upon him. There was something sublime in his pale silence, as he allowed witness after witness to pass from the box unchallenged—unquestioned. And all this false perjury the clerk registered down, and the Alderman of the Nineteenth Ward stood by to hear.

Then Chester was called upon for his defence. He stood upright grasping the railing with his right hand, his voice rang low and deep-toned as a bell, it made the Mayor start with the clear, search ing accents. He told the truth, the simple, natural truth, as it has been given to the reader, but with an eloquence, an energy which the pen has no power to describe.

"That man," he said, turning as he stood, and pointing his finger at the perjured Smith, "that man—let him step forward and tell the story he has sworn to, with his face lifted to mine, eye to eye, with the man he accuses. If he can do this—I am not other defence. Let him say what it is that has instigated him to heap this foul wrong upon an innocent man, what is to be his reward—whose danger and more subtle enemy he is seeking out! Let him but speak of these things with his eye looking into mine and I am content."

The crafty Jones had stood out back on Chester's side as a bird gazes upon the eye of a serpent. he could not look elsewhere—his face, his very mouth were white, he trembled from head to foot—not a sound tugging at his evil heart had well nigh dislodged both the truth, but the cold face near to the Mayor drove it back again even from his pallid lips.

"The witness has told his story under oath—others have substantiated it. You should have questioned him them. There is no reason why he should undergo a second examination."

This speech had its desired effect. Smith drew a deep breath, and putting on an air of dogged bravado, looked round at his companions like a man, if who had been just rescued from a fight that threatened to destroy him. The Mayor fell to sharpening his pencil again, and the Alderman made an effort to open a little gate in a corner of the railing, and would have approached his honor but for the constant frowning with which his attempt to open the gate was received by that prudent functionary, who felt that any appearance of understanding even with the Alderman, might be perilous while the chief sat regarding the proceedings with such real interest and apparent unconcern.

"And have you nothing else to offer—no witnesses?" said the Mayor, addressing Chester.

"None!" answered Chester, wiping the drops from his forehead. "I have told the truth, it that not believed all the witnesses on earth would do of no avail."

Then came from an outer chamber, hung with gilded stars, firemen's banners, and gated by the iron chest of a cell where chaste prisoners are sometimes locked, a little figure, him backed and stepped nickly footsteps.

"Mary, my poor child!" said Chester, but she only lifted her large eyes to his an instant, and going up to the railing held to it by her hand.

"May I be sworn as those men have been?" she said, addressing the startled Mayor in the same sweet tones that had claimed his compassion a month before.

"You! what can you know of the matter?" said his honor sharply, and almost thrown off his guard.

"Not much, but something I do know!" answered the child meekly. "May I speak?"

"But you are too young—how old are you?" cried the Mayor, hoping to have found a legal reason for sending away the obtrusive little imp, as he called the child in his heart.

"I am twelve, sir. Just twelve!"

The Mayor cast an uneasy glance at the chief's chair and then at the child.

"No," said Chester, "I do not know what this poor child wishes to say, but it is my wish that she be heard."

"If she is offered as a witness there is no dispute her right to speak," replied his honor, but with a disturbed countenance—and taking a little worn Bible, marked with a broad cross from the desk before him, his honor held it toward the child.

She took the Bible between both her hands and pressed her lips reverently upon it.

"Now," said the Mayor, "what do you wish to say?"

"It was so still out yonder where I waited by the door, for poor Mr. Chester was so anxious, I thought perhaps some one here might give me good news to carry home."

"This has nothing to do with the matter, child."

"I know," replied the little girl, meeting the Mayor's rebuff with her sweet humility. "But I thought perhaps you might ask how I came by the door. Well, sir, I heard what these men said about Mr. Chester. I know their voices, sir, for I heard them before, on the very night they were talking about it, as they stood under the great elm tree, standing in Mr. Chester to come out."

"The great elm tree—and how came you there, Mary?" exclaimed Chester, greatly surprised by the child's appearance.

"Do you remember, sir, that you were complaining and quiet at that sleep seemed to come? Mrs. Chester told me—I know about home, sir," continued the child, troubled that it was her duty to address the Mayor. "She sat up together sewing, and after he went out I saw the tears come into Mrs. Chester's eyes, and more at times they fell upon her work. She was crying because her husband—oh if you only knew how good he is—was obliged to go out in such bitter cold weather, when his cough was coming on again. I saw what she was feeling about, and so as he had been too ill to get supper, I asked her to let me make a cup of warm coffee and carry it out to him on his beat. She would not let me make the coffee, but the idea pleased her and she made it herself, and poured it out in a covered pitcher, while I put on a hood and shawl. I knew the way, sir, and was not in the least afraid of the night or anything else, for the stars were out and nobody ever thinks of harming a little girl like me. Some pity, and some laugh—but I am never afraid of being hurt even in the dark. I said this to Mrs. Chester, for she did not like to have me go out alone. She kissed me and said I might go, for that she was sure to take care of me anywhere. Well, sir, I went on, up one street and down another very slow, for the ice was slippery. When I saw Mr. Chester standing on a corner as I looking toward the windows of a store, and which was a great elm tree all dripping with ice—I know him by the way he stood and by his step which stone in the moonlight. Just as I was crossing over the street, with my pitcher of coffee, I saw a little boy come out from under the tree and speak to Mr. Chester, who ran over and went into the store.

"I knew that Mr. Chester would not stay long in that place, and so crept close up to the trunk of the tree, on the shady side, and holding the coffee under my shawl to keep it warm, waited for him

Isabella wiped away the tears and put her arm softly around his neck. "Oh, papa, don't take on so, I wish I had not cried."

"And what are you grieving about?" said Chester, struggling with himself, "was—were you hungry, darling?"

"No; it was—it that, but mamma, you know, had such a headache, and we wanted to do something for her, but Mary and I could find no campion nor eulogus nor anything to the house, and poor mamma kept growing worse, so we made it up between us, Mary and I, to sell the canary bird. There was not a bit of seed, nothing but kooks in the cage, and the poor thing began to hang its head, so don't blame us, we had no money for seed, and now that you and mamma are both sick, Mary thought we had better sell the bird."

Chester groaned, and his face fell once more upon the child's shoulder.

"Papa, are you angry," said Isabella, while the tears came afresh to her beautiful eyes.

"No, my child, no. It was right, it was best. But your mother, is she so very ill?"

"She is asleep now! That was the reason I only cried very softly when Mary Fuller went away with the bird—Mary made me promise not to cry out loud, for fear of waking her."

Chester arose and moved softly toward the bedroom. It had a desolate and poverty-stricken look—that little room—but still was neatly arranged and cleanly, and the pale form of the sleeper, with its strawed hair, though made up with care, looked somewhat unusual. Still there did not seem to be cause for apprehension. Since her troubles came on, the poor wife had often been a sufferer from nervous exhaustion, and this seemed but a more violent attack than usual.

Chester put the hair away from her forehead, and kissed her softly twice on the mouth and cheek, and leave she so much good man with his wife and with his child—I am ready, I am willing, this night, to lie down in the deepest grave, so they, my kind friend, live or those who love him so much. Father—oh, my soul father, who art nearer unto God than I am, place before me a thousand years of toil, of the little crooks, unseemly cards, may be taken up to the home where her father is—and that he who saved, and fed, and sheltered thy child, may be yet left to feed and shelter his own!"

It seemed as if the holy spirit of self-sacrifice that possessed this child, had enlightened both her language and her countenance. Her face, to him, so pallid, beamed with the spirit of an angel—the subdued pallour of her voice, was like the fall of some dove upon your heart. Long after her voice ceased to move were her face and hands uplifted to Heaven.

Chester heard the murmur of her voice, and his heart was subdued by it. He went into his child's bed room, and bent gently over her as she slept. The tears was still her upon her cheek, and she murmured in her sleep as Chester took her hand softly in his and pressed his pale brow upon it. Long and mournfully did the heart-stricken man gaze upon those sweet features. He saw her upon her pillow, he spread the cool linen over her arms, he bathed her forehead with cold water, and then with his tears, as he bent down to kiss it before he was it out.

Then he went into the outer room, and took from a drawer the same Bible, the same book, these he folded up carefully and placed in his pocket. Still he lingered in the room, moving from window to window, and looking sadly upon his child.

"Isabella, I am going out, come and kiss me," he said.

The child came up, cheerful and smiling, with her little arms extended. Chester sat down, and taking her upon his knee, gathered her little hands in his and gazed mournfully into her eyes.

"Isabella!" he said, with a degree of soft tenderness that filled the child with awe. She looked up wonderingly, he said no more, but sat gazing upon her. His bosom heaved with a sort of gasping struggle, sob after sob broke from his lips, and he removed her gently from his knee. He was turning to go out when Mary Fuller came from her little bedroom. Chester turned, laid both hands upon her head, and as she lifted her gentle eyes to his he bent down and kissed her—the first time in his life, and the last.

With a feeble and slow step, Chester entered the chief's office and rendered up his book and his star. He stayed for no conversation, and only answered the words of sympathy with which he was received by a faint smile. It was raining when he went forth and a thick fog fell low upon the ground. The night was drawing on dark and dreary, and everything seemed full of gloom. Chester walked on, he took no heed of the way, but turned corner after corner with reckless haste, one hand working in his bosom as if he could thus wrest away the pain that seemed strangling him, and the other grasping his walking stick upon which he paused and leaned heavily from time to time. It was one quiet dark, and Chester found himself in one of those murky streets that lead out among the shipping. The air came in from the river struggling through a forest of tall masts, and as it flowed over his face, Chester drew almost a deep breath, and quiet, for a sharp pain seized the effort—that could not cut through his lungs like a knife—and then gushed from his mouth and nostrils a torrent of blood, frothy, vividly red, that fell upon his hands and his garments in waves of crimson foam.

Chester was standing upon the pier. Beyond him was the water—close by the tall and silent ships. He cast one wild glance on those pulseless objects and cut down upon the timbers of the pier, grasping the head of his walking stick with both hands and leaning upon them his heavy breast. Faster and faster gushed up the vital blood to his lips. Like wine from the press it gushed, and every fresh wave bore with it a portion of its life.

Chester thought of his home—his wife, his child—he would die with them, he would struggle on with the death fiend and wrest back the life that should suffice to reach them. He pressed one hand to his mouth, he staggered to his feet—the staff fell under him as and its like a sapling swayed by the wind. He advanced a single step, faltered and reeling back fell upon the timbers. A sob, a faint moaning sound, answered only by the dull heavy surge of the waters below, as they lapped against the timbers of the pier. Another moan and a shudder of all the limbs, and then the fog on and down over Chester's corpse like a winding-sheet.

CHAPTER IX.

When M

United States SATURDAY POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1848.

INFORMATION WANTED

Of the following named persons who are in search for this paper:

Of R. Brunock, late of Mount Holly, New Jersey.
Of Jos S. Kenyon, late of Wilmington, Del.
O. Thos. Scott, late of Twinsburg, Ohio.
Of Order H. B. Ewing, late of West Point, N. York.
Of Capt. Jas. Dougherty, do. do. do.
Of Cadet Jas. S. Mason, do. do. do.
Of Cadet Jos. G. Foster, do. do. do.
Of A. P. Hill, do. do. do.
Of G. R. Norris, do. do. do.
Of S. D. Forsyth, do. do. do.

TO POSTMASTERS.

We trust our old friends, the Postmasters, will exert themselves and get up large clubs for the mammoth Post; or if they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offers themselves, that they will show our Prospectus to some other influential and responsible person who will be willing to do so. We think there need be no great difficulty in getting subscribers to the enlarged paper, as those who will take the trouble to compare it with the other weekly papers, cannot fail to perceive that it outshines all competition. Let it be remembered, also, that the postage is just the same on a first class paper, as on the meanest and poorest of the small reprints.

NOTICE.

Subscribers wishing their paper changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it hereafter sent to.

All persons addressing letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State as well as of the town in which they live.

Post Masters or others sending for a club, would confer a favor by having them sent to one address when they can do so conveniently. tx

FRANCE.

After the full account which we give in another place of the late insurrection in Paris, we need say comparatively but little here. It is with mingled feelings of pity and indignation that we have perused the account of the mad and fiendish doings of a portion of the Parisian populace. And while we greatly rejoice that the friends of order have triumphed, we can but admit that this insurrection proves that at least a large minority of the people of Paris, are not yet sufficiently enlightened for Republican institutions. But still let us not be too desponding, nor take a darker view of affairs than the facts warrant. As we have said, a large minority of the people of Paris have proven their incapacity to maintain a Republic; but, on the other side, we have the majority of Paris, and apparently the great mass of the population of the provinces. The disturbance in the compact heart of France, found no answering pulse in the great body of the nation. All the sympathy of the provinces seems to have been with the Government—to its aid the National Guards poured in, and gave assurance of a certain triumph, sooner or later. There is great ground for hope and faith in this fact. Almost for the first time, it has been proved that Paris is by no means France.

The immediate cause of the insurrection was the determination of the Government to throw off the burden of supporting the unemployed workmen. One hundred thousand men were enrolled upon the books of the National workshops, and in daily receipt of pay. Ten thousand were at work, receiving full pay, and the remaining ninety thousand were idle and receiving half pay. To remedy the state of things several decrees were passed. "It was prescribed that all workmen between seventeen and twenty five years of age, should enroll themselves in the army, or upon refusal to do so, should leave the workshops; accordingly, job work was to be substituted for day work; thirdly, all workmen who could not prove a residence of a certain number of months in the capital were to be sent back to their native departments; fourthly, it was resolved that large bodies of workmen should be sent from Paris into the departments for the purpose of executing works of acknowledged public utility. Five thousand were to be sent to Sologne to execute extensive projects of canalization (a clear sight) thousand hectares of unimproved lands. Twelve hundred were to be directed upon the department of the Maine and Loire to labor on the railways. The improvement of the navigation of the river Marne was to occupy three thousand more; public works in Paris and in several cities of the provinces were spoken of as destined to employ other large bodies of the unoccupied workmen. Upon one pretext or another the execution of all these plans was delayed from time to time. In the meanwhile the demoralization of the workmen was proceeding apace—their disorganization for all useful purposes, and their organization for the purposes of riot and revolution. Having no work to do, and regularly receiving their daily stipend, sufficient for their support, they spread themselves all over the city, forming little groups for the discussion of politics. They held their clubs in the open air, in which were criticised the National Assembly and the Executive Commission, and without reserve expressions of the establishment of what they called the 'Republique Democratic and Sociale.'"

When the last three decrees were promulgated to be carried into effect, they were rendered equally rather by the mode of execution than by the decree so, it appears, by the management of the officers to whom their execution was entrusted. Finally the official paper of the 22nd ult. announced that the Commission of the Executive had given orders that the enrolment of the young men should commence on the morrow. Those who did not choose to enlist were immediately to leave the workshops. This notice created great excitement. Bands of workmen paraded the streets, uttering menaces against the "Aristocratic" and "Reactionary" National Assembly. This was on the 23rd. That night the revolutionary clubs decided upon a resort to arms on the next morning. The 23rd came, and with it the insurrection.

Now it would be unjust not to sympathize with these workmen of Paris, at the same time that we condemn their course. In addition to the above ninety thousand or half pay, ninty thousand others were out of regular employ, and living "from hand to mouth," want continually staring them in the face. Is it to be wondered at that in their ignorance they should ask, "Is this a Republic, is the reign of 'liberty, equality and fraternity' commenced, and we without work or food?" Truly they were and are to be pitied as much as censured.

But even while pitying them, as we doubt not Cavaignac, Lamartine, and thousands of others did, but one course remained for the friends of law, order and the Republic to pursue—and that was to crush the rebellion as quickly as possible, and at whatever cost of life. For, had the insurgents succeeded, a reign of reprise and bloodshed, recalling the old "reign of terror," would unquestionably have commenced the end of which, after frightful massacres and turmoils, would have been another despotism.

We think it probable, from what we read that the present government of France is disposed to be a little "Reactionary." We think the accounts of the waning popularity of Lamartine, and the organization of a new ministry. The great mass of the people of France are property holders, the land being split up into parcels of five, ten and fifteen acres, and they sympathize more with the property holders of Paris (the insurgents) than they do with the working classes—and property feels itself in danger from the wild theories of the Communists. But we look upon this reaction as merely momentary, if proper and order can be preserved. With extreme caution, a free press, and the constitutional tenacity of the French mind to run to an extreme, we have no doubt that, if order can be preserved, France will soon become as Democratic as could reasonably be desired.

In relation to the excellent protest by the 16 departments, we must be careful not to blame all for the deeds of a few—and yet where even a few are so diabolical, a large number must be more than innocent. Men and women who can meditate or assent their loss, must be kept in subjection at any cost. We may pity their degradation, and make full allowance for the associations by which they have been surrounded from infancy, but not the less must we treat them to a degree, like wild beasts, which we present from harming us, if any cool, self-sustaining security to their minds.

IMPORTANT DECISION.

A serious man desired to his widow all his property, provided she remain a widow during her life; but in case she should marry again, my will is in the shall state the premises," &c.

Now the widow, thinking probably that if "single blessedness" be good, double blessedness must be better, united herself to a second husband. Whereupon the other heirs of the husband brought suit to oust her from the possession of the property, before Judge Lewis, at the June term of the Court of Common Pleas, at Lancaster. Judge Lewis decided that "the condition in restraint of marriage is void, and the second marriage of the widow does not divest her estate"—that the principles of morality—the policy of the nation—the decisions of the common law—the law of nature and law of God, unite in condemning such as void the condition, tempted to be imposed by this testator upon his widow." Thus, if we are not very much mistaken, a decidedly new doctrine.

AGRICULTURAL.

The Annual Agricultural Exhibition of the Philadelphia Society for Promoting Agriculture is to be held on the 5th and 6th of October, at the Rising Sun Village, near Germantown. It is announced also early, in order to allow those who expect to participate, to make the necessary arrangements.

HAROLD.

When Mr. Bulwer published his "Lucretia, or the Children of the Night," we took occasion to express our opinion of that novelty, which professes to render mankind good and pure hearted by bringing them into intimate contact with evil and impurity. In common with ninety nine in the hundred of the press of England and America, and among the very first, we condemned in the most unqualified terms the attempt of Mr. Bulwer to introduce his "Children of the Night" into the millions of cheerful, happy homes, where the noble language which Shakspeare and Milton spoke, is the mother tongue. In so doing it was impossible to avoid censure of the author of "Lucretia," and so loud did the voice of popular reprobation swell, that Mr. Bulwer felt it necessary to justify himself and his book in one of the English Reviews—ostensibly uncomscious of the popular truth, that a book which does not justify itself, cannot be justified.

But we refer to this matter only to express our belief that to the public censure with which "Lucretia" was received, is in a great degree owing the healthy, noble spirit that breathes in every chapter of Mr. Bulwer's new novel, "Harold, the Last of the Saxon Kings." "Harold" will undoubtedly take its place among the best novels of the age, and of course in the first rank of those written by its author. It differs from many others of Mr. Bulwer's works, as the production of a matured mind may be expected to differ from that of a youthful and immature one. It has less glow and fire than Rienzi—that love of one boyhood—but manifests a more profound insight into the human heart, especially the heart of the matured man, the hero, the statesman, and the sage. It is in one word, more a book for men, than perhaps any Mr. Bulwer has written.

For "Harold" is something more than a mere novel; or, rather, it is more what a novel should be, than the general run of those captivating works. It is a history, true in all important points, of that great event, the conquest of England by the Norman. Mr. Bulwer has made himself master of the subject, and seems to have had access to some works not easily obtained by the common scholar. In "Harold" he has described the condition of England, both political and social, under the Saxons—and also the political and social condition of Normandy, under its great Duke. The characters of Harold and William evidently have been drawn with great care, and with a constant reference to historical facts.

The point upon which the interest of the work as a novel chiefly turns is this:—Harold is in love with "Edith the fair," but Edith is related to him by blood—and though the relationship is distant, yet it is within the limit of connection which rendered parties unmarriageable by the stern laws of the Roman Church. Harold, when Earl, betrothed himself to her, with the determination to win power in the kingdom and interest with the King, sufficient to procure an indulgence from the Pope.

But with this love to Edith becomes finally connected two other considerations. Harold, at his mother's solicitation, goes to the Court of William of Normandy, to prevail upon the Duke to release his brother and nephew who are held as hostages by the Norman. William, however, takes advantage of Harold's noble reliance upon his good faith, and detains him also. At length, under darkly hint ed menaces of perpetual imprisonment, loss of his eyes, &c., Harold is prevailed upon to take an oath to support William's claim to the crown of England—an oath he never intends to keep—and thus gains his own and his nephew's liberty; the crafty Norman breaking his promise so far as Harold's brother is concerned, on the plea that he will keep him inviolate, as hostage for Harold's performance of his oath.

Harold returns to England, and upon the death of King Edward, is unanimously chosen king by the Witan, or National Assembly of the realm. But he violated oath—although an oath wrung from him by force, and broken by the after fraud of William—weighs on his soul; and he would fain have a dispensation from the Pope to remove the burden. At that time his friends press upon him the necessity of cementing his power, by a marriage with "Aldyth," the daughter of a great political house. Thus is the spiritual tragedy of the weak England being menaced by the Norman, and divided, it is urged imperatively upon him by his nearest counsellors and most devoted adherents, that duty requires the sacrifice of his own private feelings. It is also represented to him that it is in vain to hope to obtain two dispensations from the Pope in his favor—that if he obtains one setting aside his oath, it would be in vain to apply for another to allow his marriage with Edith. The result of the mental conflict is doubtful, until Edith is informed of the state of affairs—and then she, in the nobleness and purity of a true woman's unselfish and devoted nature, seeks access to Harold, and joins her solicitations to those of his friends:

"Oh, Harold!" she exclaimed, "I dare then remember that in the old time I said, 'Edith had loved thee less, if thou hadst not loved England more than Edith.' Recall, recall those words—And deemest thou now that I, who have gazed for years into thy clear soul, and learned there to say to woman's heart in the light of all glorious nature—a noblest man—deemest thou, oh Harold, that I am weaker now than then, when I scarce knew what England and glory were?"

"Edith, Edith, what wouldst thou say? What knowest thou? Who hath told thee? What led thee hither, to take part against thyself?"

"It matters not who told me; I know all—What led me? Mine own soul, and mine own love!" Springing to her feet, and clasping his hand in both hands, while she looked into his face, she resumed; "I do not say to thee, 'Grieve not to part!' for I know too well thy faith, thy honor—thy heart, so grand and so soft. But I do say, near above thy grief, and be more than man for the sake of men. Yet, Harold, let that last time I behold thee, I clasp thy hand, I lean on thy breast, I hear its beating, and I shall go hence without a fear."

* * * * * * *

"Dost thou know," said the earl, striving to speak calmly, "dost thou know that it is not only to resign thee that they demand—that it is to resign thee, and for another?"

"Yes!" cried the maiden; and two burning tears, despite her strong and preternatural self-exaltation, swelled from the dark fringe, and rolled slowly down the colorless cheek, as she added, with the proud voice, "I know it! but that other is not Aldyth, it is England! In her, in Aldyth, behold the dear pledge of thy native land. With her on thee dwelleth the love which thy native land should command. So thinking, then art reconciled, and I consoled. It is not to woman that thou deserteth Edith."

But we will only let our readers sufficiently into the secrets of the book, to whet their appetites, not to satisfy them. If they would know more, let them seek, and they shall find. We would caution our young lady readers, however, from imagining that they shall find in Harold what is commonly called a "love tale." There is love in it, as there is in life. But as in life there is much more to be done than mere "sitting with lips," so in "Harold" there is matter for much solid, serious thought, as well as that which whirls the reader along with railroad speed, or lays him, by sympathy, in Elysium.

With one more question, the sentiment of which is as true as it is beautifully expressed, we conclude:

"It is the nature of the happiness which we derive from our affections to be calm; its immense influence upon our outward life is not known till it is troubled or withdrawn. By placing his heart at peace, man leaves rest to the energies and passions, or permits them flow onward to the aims and objects which interest labor or arouse ambition. Thus absorbed in the occupation without, he is lulled into a certain long-fulness of the value of that internal repose which gives health and vigor to faculties he employs abroad. But once remove that source left, almost unnoticed, amidst the inward calcadia to the turbulent cloud of our active being. Say to the heart-sick man whom then need a mart, camp, or senate, who seems to these all other upon his worldly interests, 'Thy home is left desolate—thy wonted fireside gods are scattered—that sweet, tuneless instrument in the regular mechanism of the spring, which set the large wheels of thy soul into motion, is thine retreatest'—and straightway all count on seems robbed of its object—all aim of its allurings charm. 'Ichabod' comes to mind in gone!" 'Oh a start, that man will awaken from the sunlit visions of mountain ambition, and exclaim in his inevitable anguish, 'What are all the rewards of my labor, now that have robbed me of repose?' How little are all the gains among fourth state, in a world of rivals and hostilities, and of the same wilder desperate, I have of till it was lost, and the sense of security from moral ill which I took from the trust and sympathy of love?"

LEGAL BARBARITY.

There is a barbarity in the administration of the laws and in the legal decisions of a monarchical country, which the inhabitants of a Republic can hardly realize. For instance the Court of Queen's Bench, England, has recently decided against the legality of all marriages made with a deceased wife's sister. By this decision all such marriages are cancelled and declared void and void—the issue of such marriages declared illegitimate, and all hereditary rights and claims of property utterly abrogated.

Without taking any ground either in favor of or against the propriety of marrying the sister of a deceased wife—though we confess we see not at this moment any reasonable objection to such marriages—we can but feel a flush of indignation at the interference of the law as above recorded. The judges, in the abstract case, seem to have considered it a slight matter, to declare the wives of thousands of their fellow citizens—fellow subjects, we mean—concubines, and their children illegitimate. In an arbitrary government every man who can exercise power, seems to be influenced by the very force of example, to exercise that power in a severe and arbitrary manner; while in a Republic, the mild and popular spirit of the government appears to influence all, down to the very constables and watchmen. "Like the master in the mess," is an old and true proverb.

SMALL POTATOES.

The New York Mirror was recently called, by its co-adjutor, the Herald, a "small potato," whereupon the Mirror then soliloquized:

"Small potatoes are very far from being bad vegetables—any are very good, what there is of them, and capable of producing large ones. A small potato is much superior to a big mushroom, or an overgrown squash. Small potatoes, too, are always found in the centre, while large ones are almost always hollow-hearted. Viewing the subject in all its bearings, we cannot see but that to be 'small' to a small potato is decidedly complimentary.

IRELAND.

The New York Tribune learns that T. F. Meagher, one of the leading Irish patriots, is coming to this country "to lay the story of Ireland's wrongs and the prospects of Ireland's disenthralment, before the American people."

Our readers know we have all along manifested strong sympathy with the oppressed people of Ireland; but we confess we are but growing indifferent to the subject. We are tired of listening to talk about Ireland's wrongs, and eloquent threats of what Irish patriotism intends to do, which are followed by no corresponding action. And this last movement of Mr. Meagher's, chronicled above, nearly fills the measure of our endurance. What have the people of this country to do with the matter, that a leading Irish patriot should come to talk to us about "Ireland's wrongs."

We should think if Ireland's condition be as bad as it is represented, she would require the services of Mr. Meagher at home. The idea that the people of the United States can give any really efficient aid to the cause of Irish liberty, is preposterous. If Ireland cannot work out her own political salvation, America cannot help her. By her own arm, or not at all, her freedom must be wrought.

BLUNDERS.

Queer assertions appear in the papers sometimes. Thus a "Democrat," in the Ledger, of this city calls upon his fellow Democrats to nominate Robert Fleming, of Lycoming, as the candidate of the party for Governor, "for," says he, his "name alone is a host in political argument." We think our Democratic friends would be better pleased to have a candidate whose name would be a host to his own party.

A Pittsburg paper, in an article upon the reception of the volunteers at Pittsburg, says of the address of Hon. W. Wilkins:

He spoke for a few moments in an unusually impressive style. We did not succeed in catching his words, but some of the ideas reached us.

How the writer could know that Mr. Wilkins "spoke in an unusually impressive style," and yet "not succeed in catching his words," (though "some of the ideas," it seems, reached him,) is a question easier asked than answered.

We allude to these blunders for the sake of, not to find fault. Such errors will occur, both in the case of men who have no call upon them to write often for the press; and in that of editors and reporters, upon whom the call is continual for "copy, copy."

ÆREOLITES.

As to the origin of meteoric stones, there are many conjectures. Some suppose them to come from volcanoes in the moon—others think they are thrown by volcanoes in the planets out of the reach of the attraction of those bodies, and wander about space until they come in contact with the attraction of the earth, which brings them down for ever—others imagine they are engendered by the combination of various gasses in the atmosphere—some have an idea that they are whisked off from the tails of the comets, as a boat is often thrown into the air by a toss from the tail of a whale—others (but these are heathen) regard them as the dread thunderbolts of Jove—while a great many others, and perhaps the wisest portion of the scientific world, have no definite explanations or unsatisfactory, and confess that "there are more things in Heaven and earth, than are dreamt of in their philosophy."

BABY JUMPERS.

The honor of another important invention, besides the magnetic telegraph, has been snatched from the Yankees by a Philadelphia lady, viz: that baby jumpers are as old as the pyramids, and that our Indians are the original contrivers of that remarkable method of leaving children to take care of themselves.

So says a New York contemporary, and we embrace the occasion to add, that we can testify from personal observation, that baby jumpers are "all the rage" among the Sioux. We have a little fellow "to hom," as our Eastern friends say, who jumps in one of them till he laughs again. The fact is, the man who introduced baby jumpers, granting that he did steal the idea from the Indians, deserves the eternal gratitude of all mothers, and—fine lot of bouncing babies of his own.

MR. MITCHELL.

Mr. Mitchell, it appears from Bermuda advices, will not be placed on the public works until he recovers his health. He is suffering from asthma, and has now a small cabin allowed him on board a convict hulk. It is said that he dined with the captain of the steamer Scourge, on the whole passage out. If this be true, judging from a late speech of one of the English Ministry in the House of Commons, the captain of the Scourge will probably get his walking ticket, upon his arrival home. The Ministry seem determined to show no mercy. Probably for whatever kindness Mitchell has received, the credit should be given to the subordinate officers of the Government.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

The returning volunteers are expected to arrive in Philadelphia on Monday next; great preparations are being made to receive them in a complimentary manner. Lieutenants Duffield and Hare, concerned in a murder at Mexico, arrived at Pittsburg last week, and put up at a respectable hotel, placing their names boldly upon the register. The proprietor, on learning who they were, ordered them to leave his house immediately. The same thing happened to them at New Orleans.

SEA BATHING.

To secure safety in sea bathing, a correspondent of the Newark Advertiser recommends the attaching of long pieces of strong cord to stakes driven into the sand, the end of the cord to be made into a slipping noose and passed round the waist or under the arms at pleasure. Perhaps the better plan would be to have the cord tie fast to a stout stake, and depend upon keeping hold with the hands. Two or three persons might in fact, use the same line.

A MAMMOTH SHEET.

In these exciting times, when the interests of our country readers imperatively require the publication of a large amount of Foreign News, none of which our city readers have already seen in their daily papers, the mammoth size of our sheet is a great advantage. We are thus enabled to satisfy our country friends, and give besides to our city subscribers, a much more comprehensive reading ban the usual of a common sized paper contains.

GOOD, IF TRUE.

The Liverpool Mercury reports a rumor to the effect, that the Ministerial Budget is to be produced immediately, and that a startling feature is to be a reduction of the Royal Allowance, proposed by the Queen herself!

Such a proposition on the part of little Vic, would almost amount to taking a fresh hold for her family, upon the British sceptre. If she is wise, she will do it.

FATHER MATHEW.

The editor of the European Times has seen a letter from this Apostle of Temperance, in which he says he has perfectly recovered, and hopes to take his passage for America next month. Father Mathew has been very often disappointed in his efforts to come to America—may he be equally unlucky in trying to get away from us.

NOT BAD.

The best toast we have seen lately was one tended at the Fourth of July celebration of the inmates of the Insane Asylum, at Utica, New York. It was as follows:

Irish struggles for freedom—a little too literary and a little more crazy, Pat.

THE NEW GOVERNOR.

The acting Governor of Pennsylvania, Hon. W. F. Johnston, intends, in due time, to issue a writ for the election of a Governor in October, as he considers that the language of the Constitution is imperative.

DECLINED.

A Democratic contemporary says that "Old Whitey" has declined the nomination for the Vice Presidency tendered him by some. "When asked if he would consent to run on Vice Presidential ticket he answer was 'Neigh.' A sensible old horse that."

RIGHT.

The War Department has dismissed the charges preferred against Gen. Scott by Gen. Pillow. The Department has shown its sense. Sufficient for the day is the folly thereof.

EX-GOVERNOR SHUNK.

When last heard from, the Ex-Governor was extremely low. Little hope is entertained of his recovery.

New Publications.

Brunhilda and Sintera. By Friedrich Bremer. New York: Harper & Brothers. We are pleased to announce to the thousands of admirers of that delightful writer, Miss Bremer, another novel, translated as usual by Mary Howitt. The original is published in one vol. next to Miss Howitt, and from it this translation was made. We have not had time yet to read "Brothers and Sisters," but hope to be able, after we have done so, to give it a more extended notice. For sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia. Price twenty-five cents.

The Bachelor's Daughters and Harry Muir. By Mrs. Gray. Mrs. Gray is the author of various novels, among which we may specify "The Duke and the Cousin," "The Little Wife," and "Sybil Lennard." The present volume is published by T. B. Peterson, 102 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, being one of his uniform edition of Gray's works.

The Literary World.—One of the most valuable periodicals to literary men, that we know, is the "Literary World," published weekly by Osgood & Co., New York. It contains announcements and notices of new works—also criticisms upon and extracts from the best of them. C. F. Gunther is the editor. The price is three dollars a year.

Memoirs: A Last Resort. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. We know of some who are willing to let a man of genius tell his story in his own way. We can read Thomas Carlyle, but only without pressing every minute to find fault with his style, but with exceeding great pleasure at what is said, and the manner of saying it. But when dwarfs attempt to tread in the footsteps of giants, the length of their strides, so far from impressing the beholder with awe and wonder, only excites ridicule. The author of the present work, not only thinks Mr. Carlyle "the jubilee and most original writer of this century," for which opinion we find no fault with him, but, either voluntarily or involuntarily, attempts to imitate him—and succeeds about as well as a monkey in imitating a man.

Apart from this matter of style, the book before us appears to contain a great deal of reliable information relative to Mirabeau. The author appears to have done his work in an honest, conscientious spirit. Mirabeau in one of his heroes, and he comes him wherever an excuse is possible; but so long as facts are honestly stated, a sensible reader can form his own conclusions as to the merit or guilt of actions. Considering the important part acted by Mirabeau in the old French Revolution, the publication of his life at this moment is very opportune.

Graham's Magazine. Graham, for August, is an admirable number. The engravings are "The Departure," illustrative of a fine tale by Mrs. Stephens; "The Sisters," a beautiful picture, remarkable for the family likeness, and yet the difference between the two faces, such as we often see in nature; and a portrait of the late Maria Brooks, which looks as if "Maria del Occidente" had Indian blood in her veins. The literary contents of this number are by Griswold, Clark, Baker, Simms, Mrs. Kinney, Herbert, Mrs. Stephens, Street, Read, Taylor, Foster, &c.

Godey's Magazine. The August number of Godey is also an excellent one. The first plate is called (rather tragily, we think,) "Woman's Our Century." It contains portraits of Mrs. Stewart, Harriet Newell, Fanny Forester, Ann H. Judson, and E. B. Dwight. Then we have an engraving of "Two of the Upper Ten," illustrative of a capital story by Mr. Arthur—then a Scene in a Nine Story,—and then, last and least of the steel engravings, a Fashion Plate. There are, however, in addition, various wood cuts, some of which, under the head of "Health and Beauty," look very much like an attempt at Mr. Godey, to initiate his lady readers into a skillful use of their hands and of "rouge." Mr. Godey will turn out many a termagant, without he is careful. Such a picture of ladies making fists, and flourishing rolls, is enough to frighten all the unmarried male population of the country, from the city of Gotham. The literary contents of this number are by Griswold, Grace Greenwood, Samuel D. Patterson, Miss Leslie, &c., &c.

Life and Writings of Cassius Marcellus Clay. New York: Harper & Brothers. There is probably no man in the United States, who has not received a party nomination for some important office, about whom the community at large have more decided opinions than C. M. Clay. He is admired and detested by numbers, but very few have "no decided opinion" about him. In the volume before us, we have the speeches, addresses, and newspaper articles of Mr. Clay—with a preface and memoir by Horace Greeley, to whom Mr. Clay dedicated the work, as "the most trusting friend and ablest vindicator." For sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

Ladies' National Magazine. The June number of the National contains two engravings, "Alice Linley," and a Fashion Plate. The contributors are Mrs. Stephens, Mrs. M. C. Whyte, Henry Morford, Rev. Sidney Dyer, &c. There is also a beautiful steel engraving of "The Maid and Man of Genius," illustrated, by Jacob Jones.

American Journal of Medical Sciences. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. The July number of this Quarterly contains a large number of articles, on subjects interesting to the profession. Published by Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia.

General Taylor Almanac, for 1848. Contains accounts of the various battles, in which General Taylor has been engaged. For sale by T. B. Peterson, 102 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Littell's Magazine. The last number of this Magazine is for sale by Zieber & Co., Philadelphia.

Life in New York.

LETTERS FROM NEW YORK. NO. XIII.

New York, July 17, 1848.

Gentlemen:—The could almost be content to live confined in this fortress of sultry bricks, for the sake of a daily glimpse of the fresh and sparkling sheet of the bay, and an occasional trip to the breezy country. I feel, at this moment, the most favored of all cities. The full broad tides of the Hudson and East Rivers, sweeping both sides of the island, mingle their pure air-currents with the exhalations of its crowded dwellings, and though they do not entirely sweep away the miasmatic emanations on a hot afternoon, they still create a continual draught and keep the lungs of the city free from oppression.

But if you are faint and languid, with your blood just simmering in the channels where it should run a cool current, if your fancies and brains is hazy and your ideas taking a siesta, while your hand writes of itself, as Charles Lamb quaintly says: "just as chickens run about a little after their heads are cut off"—then summon energy to heat your Dante to Pier No. 3, North River, and take the first boat for the shore. The movement of the steamer over the cool, translucent water, creates a breeze which soon fans you into a feeling of refreshing zest; the glorious shores on either side appeal to your sense of beauty, and by and by a star of admiration creeps along your leaves and finds its way to your heart. Your eyes begin to brighten; you move to the side of the boat, and watch the spray sashing into a fringe of creamy foam—and then, last and least of the steel engravings, a Fashion Plate. There are, however, in addition, various wood cuts, some of which, under the head of "Health and Beauty," look very much like an attempt at Mr. Godey, to initiate his lady readers into a skillful use of their hands and of "rouge." Mr. Godey will turn out many a termagant, without he is careful. Such a picture of ladies making fists, and flourishing rolls, is enough to frighten all the unmarried male population of the country, from the city of Gotham. The literary contents of this number are by Griswold, Grace Greenwood, Samuel D. Patterson, Miss Leslie, &c., &c.

Life and Writings of Cassius Marcellus Clay. New York: Harper & Brothers. There is probably no man in the United States, who has not received a party nomination for some important office, about whom the community at large have more decided opinions than C. M. Clay. He is admired and detested by numbers, but very few have "no decided opinion" about him. In the volume before us, we have the speeches, addresses, and newspaper articles of Mr. Clay—with a preface and memoir by Horace Greeley, to whom Mr. Clay dedicated the work, as "the most trusting friend and ablest vindicator." For sale by Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia.

Ladies' National Magazine. The June number of the National contains two engravings, "Alice Linley," and a Fashion Plate. The contributors are Mrs. Stephens, Mrs. M. C. Whyte, Henry Morford, Rev. Sidney Dyer, &c. There is also a beautiful steel engraving of "The Maid and Man of Genius," illustrated, by Jacob Jones.

American Journal of Medical Sciences. Edited by Isaac Hays, M. D. The July number of this Quarterly contains a large number of articles, on subjects interesting to the profession. Published by Lea & Blanchard, Philadelphia.

General Taylor Almanac, for 1848. Contains accounts of the various battles, in which General Taylor has been engaged. For sale by T. B. Peterson, 102 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Littell's Magazine. The last number of this Magazine is for sale by Zieber & Co., Philadelphia.

FOREIGN NEWS.

SEVEN DAYS LATER

BLOODY CONFLICT IN PARIS

Government Triumphant—Loss of Life, 8,000 to 10,000—The Archbishop of Paris, Six Deputies and Fourteen General Officers among the Slain—The Archbishop Slain while Proposing Peace to the Insurgents—Horrible Barbarities.

We were able to lay a condensed summary of the following important intelligence, brought by the Niagara, before a portion of our readers, last week, but we think the deep interest which is taken by Americans generally in the events of the French Revolution, warrants us in occupying a portion of our broad sheet with the full particulars of one of the most terrible conflicts that ever occurred between inhabitants of the same city.

The steamship Niagara arrived at Boston on the 12th. The conflict lasted four days, and resulted in the triumph of the Government.

The loss of life was terrible, from eight to ten thousand. Six Deputies and fourteen General Officers were among the killed. The Archbishop of Paris also lost his life.

ORIGIN OF THE INSURRECTION.

Pursuant to their determination to dismount the rabble, workshops, the Government directed that a draft of 1,000 of them, inhabitants of the province, should leave town on the 23d. They were supplied with money, and orders for board and lodging. They left town, but halted outside the barriers, and there spread a large share of their money. About 3 o'clock a body, amounting to 400, returned, and paid a visit to the Executive Government. M. Marie presented himself to hear their complaints. He was addressed by the chief, but M. Marie refused to hear him, as he had been informed that he had attacked the Assembly on the 15th of May, and he could not recognize him; then turning to the others, he said, "You are not the slaves of this man, you can explain your grievances." M. Marie entreated them not to be led into a rebellion, and assured them that the Government was occupied with the consideration of measures for the improvement of their condition. The delegates withdrew, but did not give an accurate account of their interview. On the contrary, they stated that M. Marie called them slaves. The incident was then commenced shouting, "Down with the Executive Commission!" "Down with the Assembly!" Some of them attempted to force into the Church of St. Sulpice, with the intention of ringing the tocsin, but the gates were closed to prevent them. Thence they proceeded to the quays, singing, "We will remain; we will remain!" They next proceeded to the Faubourge St. Antoine and St. Marceau, and stationed themselves on the Place de la Bastile, crying, "Vive Napoleon!"

DETAILS OF THE INSURRECTION.

On Thursday night barricades were erected, and the National Guard turned out. The insurgents seized all that portion of the city about the Faubourg St. Antoine, and threatened the Hotel de Ville.

On Friday, there was some fighting, in which the insurgents were successful. Lamartine rode with the staff of Gen. Cavaignac to quell the insurrection, but without effect.

Artillery was used, but at night the insurgents had gained ground and strength.

On Saturday, the Assembly declared its session permanent. The Government resigned the military and civil power, which was given to General Cavaignac, who declared Paris in a state of siege.

They declared that they should have been wanting in their duties and honor, had they withdrawn before petitions or a public proof, they only withdrew before a vote of the Assembly. Applause resounded in every hour to the Assembly, and as the intelligence arrived of the slaughter of the National Guards, and the fall of one General after another, who were killed or wounded by the insurgents, the sensation became deep and alarming. Various proclamations were issued by Cavaignac, to induce the insurgents to lay down their arms, but to no effect. The whole of Saturday was employed in desperate fighting, on both sides, except a hail during a frightful thunder storm. On the afternoon of Friday the conflicts were without intermission. On Saturday, however, the carnage and battles on the South of the river were horrible.

During the whole of Friday night, and until a o'clock on Saturday, the roll of the artillery, and the noise of the muskets was incessant. In this frightful state of things the Assembly betrayed not a little alarm. Deputations from the Assembly were proposed to go and entreat the combatants to cease this fratricidal strife, but all the concurrent reports proved that the insurgents were bent on only yielding up the struggle with their lives, and their valor was only surpassed by their desperate resolution.

On Saturday night the state of the Capital was awful. Troops were pouring in from the neighboring departments. The red flag of the Socialists was raised, and the fighting continued.

On Sunday, the President of the Assembly announced that the Government had completely succeeded in suppressing the revolt on the left side of the city, and that Gen. Cavaignac had given the insurgents on the right bank of the Seine till 10 o'clock to surrender. If they did not do so by that hour, preparations had been made to bring the heaviest artillery to bear upon them, and no doubt remained that the insurrection could be put down.

On Monday the re-inforcements General Lamoricière had received from Cavaignac enabled him to burn in the insurgents in the Eastern part of the city, but although reduced to extremities, they still fought with incredible valor. It was thought on Monday morning early that they would surrender, but again the hope then held out of the termination of the insurrection was not immediately realized.

At half-past 10 the fighting was resumed, and it was only after a frightful struggle of about two more hours that the Government troops, everywhere victorious, prevailed, and the chief part of the insurrection being broken, the insurgents were either taken prisoners, or fled into the country in the direction towards Vincennes.

The Eastern quarters comprising the Faubourg St. Antoine, du Temple, Montmartre and Popincourt, were the last subdued. The last hand-to-hand conflict took place in the cemetery of Pierre la Chaise; but the Garde Mobile hunted them even from this sanctuary, and they were slaughtered in the neighboring fields.

On Tuesday the insurrection was definitely quelled. The loss of life had been terrible—no fewer than fourteen General Officers had been shot down du combat. A greater loss than in the most splendid engagements of Napoleon. Amongst those who fell, were General Negrier, and Generals Duart and Bruc. Generals Cherubini and Rambolt, and others severely wounded, four or five members of the National Assembly killed, and as many more wounded; but the most touching death is that of the Archbishop of Paris.

The venerable Prelate on Sunday volunteered to go to the insurgents as a messenger of peace. Cavaignac said that such a step was full of danger, but this Christian pastor persisted. He advanced, attended by his two vicars, towards the barricades with an olive branch borne before him, when he was ruthlessly shot in his grass, and fell, mortally wounded. The venerable pastor was ordered by the insurgents to the nearest hospital in St. Antoine, where he received the last sacrament, languished and has died.

The editor of the Pere Duchesne, M. Lacroix, was killed in the attack on the barricade Rochebouart, where, in the dress of an ouvrier, he was fighting at the head of a party of insurgents. It will probably be never correctly ascertained to what extent the sacrifice of human life in this frightful struggle was carried. Some have placed it at one-third of the troops, at from 9,000 to 10,000 slain, but we hope this is exaggerated.

The number of the insurgents taken prisoners, exceeds 5,000. All the prisons are filled, as well as the dungeons and vaults of the Tuileries, the Louvre, Palais Royal, the Chamber of Deputies, and the Hotel de Ville. A military commission has already been appointed to try such as were found with arms in their hands, and they will probably be deported to the Marquesas Islands, or some transatlantic French Colony. A decree has been proposed with that object. We have not space to recount many acts of individual heroism.

Many soldiers exhibited sublime courage. On the other hand, the savage cruelty with which the insurgents waged war, almost exceeds belief.—They tortured some of their own prisoners, cut off their hands and feet, and inflicted barbarities worthy of savages. The women were hired to poison the wine sold to the soldiers, who drank it, relied and died. It seems to be believed generally, that if the insurgents had succeeded in following up their most admirably concerted plans of operation, and have advanced their line and possessed themselves of the Hotel de Ville, and followed up their success along the two banks of the river, that the whole city would have been given up to pillage.—Indeed, the words pillage and rape are said to have been inscribed on one of their banners. Not less than 10,000 were taken by the National Guard and captured in the Faubourg St. Antoine alone.

Every species of artifice was employed to convey ammunition. The pails of the milk-women, the couches of the wounded and even the coffins of the dead, were found to contain gunpowder and cartouches. Large sums of money in gold and notes were discovered on the persons of men apparently in extreme poverty, and of young children. The women of Paris took a most active part in the struggle. They conveyed orders and signals through the hottest fire.

[From the London Times, June 26th.]

The City

United States SATURDAY POST.

Philadelphia:

SATURDAY, JULY 32, 1848.

THE POTATO ROT.

The potato rot has made its appearance with much virulence in various quarters of the country since the late rains. It is mentioned in the Newburyport Herald as being in that vicinity, also on Long Island, and in Montgomery and Bucks, in this State.

The following remedy for the rot we find among our exchanges:

"A perfect cure for the potato disease has at last been discovered, and applied to the crop in Germany. Dr. Kintoch, of Berlin, has received a reward of $1,400 from the Prussian Government, for the discovery. The same manner of preventing the disease was discovered nearly at the same time, by the celebrated Professor Leibig, but Dr. Kintoch has tested it for the space of three years, successfully, and on a large scale. The plan is to pinch off about half an inch from the top of the plant, when it has reached a height of six to nine inches, and to repeat the same operation ten or eleven weeks after the time of planting, on all the stems of the plant."

POLITICAL ITEMS.

Henry A. Wise made a Cass speech on the 4th at Yorktown. He accepts the nomination of Presidential Elector.

Including Delaware, the South has a political preponderance of two votes in the Senate, or in other words, there are 30 Senators from the slaveholding States, and 28 Senators from the free States.

In New Hampshire the people voted, 17,804 to 12,174, in favor of a law to prohibit the sale of liquor except for mechanical and medicinal purposes—but the Legislature did not pass such a law.

Hon. David Wilmot, of this State, in a letter published in the Elmira Gazette, says that he intends to support Van Buren. He also avows his opposition to any "Compromise," in the matter of territory.

CAVAIGNAC.

We derive the following passage from the correspondence of the New York Courier:

Cavaignac is now the popular idol. Lamartine is unheard of. Many journals are calling for a special decree to name Cavaignac, President of the Republic. There is a general want of something felt permanent; but under the present disposition of affairs, France is as far from it now as two months ago.

Henecefoth no Louis Bonaparte, no Thiers, not even a Lamartine for the head of the French Republic—but Cavaignac is destined to be either its Napoleon or its Washington. His conduct hitherto, and his known character, encourage the hope that he will resemble the latter rather than the former.

ASIATIC CHOLERA.

The London Globe states that letters have been received from Dr. Andreosky, physician to the commander-in-chief of the Russian forces in Circassia, stating that the mineral saptha obtained from Bekre, on the shores of the Caspian Sea, given in doses of from ten to fifteen and twenty drops, repeated if necessary, had proved a cure for Asiatic Cholera, even during the most extreme collapses. This saptha is of a white or rose color, and is used undistilled. It is much stronger than the ordinary saptha of commerce.

BOARD OF HEALTH.—The number of deaths during the last week in this city was 209—adults 64, and children 144.

From Washington.

CONGRESSIONAL NEWS.

SENATE.

On the 11th, Mr. Rusk moved to take up the bill relative to the Texas Navy, but after a brief debate, the motion was negatived by a vote of 17 to 19.

Mr. Atherton made a motion to take up the Naval Appropriation Bill, which being agreed to, the consideration of the question pending when the bill was last up was resumed. It was an amendment striking out the appropriation for the Marine Hospital. After some debate, the subject was indefinitely laid aside.

The consideration of the Oregon Bill, being the order of the day, was then resumed. Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, addressed the Senate upon the constitutional powers of Congress in relation to the government of acquired territory.

On the 12th, the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the Indian Appropriation Bill, and asked that a Committee of Conference should be appointed by the House. A Committee upon the part of the Senate was appointed.

Mr. Turney moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the bill in relation to the Navy of the former Republic of Texas. On motion of Mr. Rusk the reconsideration was laid upon the table, with the understanding that it should be called up at another time.

On motion of Mr. Atherton, the bill to pay the liquidated claims against Mexico was taken up and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; after which, the bill was read a third time and passed.

A message in writing was received from the President, accompanying the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry held at San Patricio. Ordered to be printed.

The special order of the day, the Oregon Bill, was then taken up, and Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, addressed the Senate in support of the extreme Southern views in relation to slavery, and in opposition to the proposed compromise.

Mr. Davis said, in conclusion, that he would be satisfied with the Missouri Compromise, if it was accompanied with a guarantee that the question should thus be put at rest forever.

Mr. Clayton moved that the bill and amendment be referred to a select committee of eight, four from the South and four from the North, equally divided also as to their party politics, and to be selected by ballot, who shall report what propositions, if any, can be accomplished.

Mr. Foote heartily approved of the proposition. A debate ensued, in which Messrs. Fitzgerald, Calhoun, Corwin and Butler took part, respecting the course to be pursued by the free States in relation to runaway slaves. After a very long debate, the motion was adopted by a vote of yeas 31, nays 14.

On the 13th, Mr. Lewis presented the credentials of Mr. King, the successor of Mr. Bagby, of Alabama, who, being duly sworn, took his seat.

Mr. Beverly Johnson presented the credentials of Mr. Pearce, re-elected Senator from the State of Maryland for six years from the 4th of March next.

On motion of Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, the bill making appropriations for erecting light houses, light-boats and buoys, was taken up, and after slight amendment was passed.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. Downs asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill facilitating the entry of preemption claims, which was read a first and second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. Hannegan then moved that the Senate proceed to a ballot for Chairman of the Select Committee upon the Oregon Bill, ordered yesterday, which motion prevailed. Mr. Clayton was elected, having received 33 out of the 38 votes cast. The Senate then proceeded to ballot for the other seven members of the committee, when Messrs. Bright, Dickinson, Atchesen, Calhoun, Phelps, Underwood and Clarke, were elected.

Messrs. Phelps, Dickinson, Bright and Clark, are from the Free States; Messrs. Clayton, Calhoun, Atchison and Underwood from the South.—Messrs. Phelps and Clark are Wilmot Proviso men.

On motion of Mr. Bell, the bill authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to make a just settlement of the claims of the Cherokee nation upon the Government, according to the principles established by the treaty of August, 1846, was taken up, in the debate on which the participants were Messrs. Atherton, Bell, Turney, Sebastian and Calhoun. After which, on motion of Mr. Bell, the Senate went into Executive Session, and subsequently adjourned.

On the 14th, after the transaction of some unimportant business, on motion of Mr. Dickinson, the bill to establish a branch mint in the city of New York was taken up. He advocated its passage in a brief speech.

An amendment was submitted to establish a branch mint in the city of Charleston. Mr. Bedinger spoke in strong terms of opposition both to the bill and the amendment, declaring that they involved all unnecessary expense, which was entirely uncalled for, and was not warranted by the present condition of the treasury.

Mr. Dickinson replied to the argument of the last speaker, and was followed by Mr. Niles, who advocated the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Butler supported the amendment. Mr. Dix made a speech in favor of the bill.

Mr. Badger rejoined and took the opposite ground.

After further debate, the amendment was adopted, and the vote then being taken upon the bill as amended, it was lost by a vote of yeas 21, nays 27.

On the 15th, a Committee of Conference on the Military Bill from the House, was appointed, consisting of Mr. Benton, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, and Mr. Davis, of Mississippi.

Mr. Benton moved that the Senate go into Executive Session, which was agreed to, and after some time spent therein the doors were opened, and the Senate adjourned over till Monday.

On the 17th, Mr. Niles gave notice that he would, the next day, move that the Senate take up the bill reported by the Select Committee, to which had been subjoined the subject of Mr. Whitney's railroad to the Pacific.

On motion of Mr. Atherton, the Naval Appropriation Bill was taken up, and several amendments adopted.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson offered an amendment making an appropriation to indemnify the officers and crews of the Peacock, Missouri, Grampus, Shark and Somers, for the losses sustained by them in the destruction of those vessels. Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Dayton, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill providing for a modification of the law regulating pilots.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On the 11th, after the usual preliminary routine, the Speaker announced the resolutions submitted by the Committee of Commerce, to whom had been referred the memorial from the Chicago Convention, as the first business in order. The first resolution having already been adopted, the second resolution came up, declaring that the commerce and the common defences of the country require the exercise of the power of internal improvement, which the House asserted in the first resolution belonged properly to the general government. Upon the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative. Yeas 112. Nays 55.

The third resolution, declaring that the reasons given by the President for vetoing the River and Harbor Bills are insufficient, was then passed by a vote of yeas 91, nays 71.

The fourth resolution, denying the propriety of giving to the States the power of levying tonnage duties for the improvement of rivers and harbors, was also adopted, the vote being yeas 109, nays 59.

The remaining resolutions were then severally adopted.

On the 12th, Mr. Nicoll, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill to establish a Branch Mint in the city of New York; read twice and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The Reciprocity Bill between Canada and the United States, respecting the productions of each, was taken up and passed.

On the 13th, after the usual preliminary business, Mr. Hudson rose to a privileged question, and stated that during a call of the House the previous evening, some forty members who were absent were each fined two dollars, and the sergeant-at-arms was ordered to bring them before the House that morning, but, as many of the offenders were inexperienced, he would move to dispense with the whole proceedings.

Messrs. Sims, Lahm and Lincoln made some jocular remarks, which occasioned considerable laughter and confusion. Mr. L. then called for the previous question, and Mr. Conger moved to lay the motion upon the table, when the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 59.

While the vote was being taken, Mr. Henly made a motion, which, besides being out of order, was disrespectful to the Speaker, who ordered the sergeant-at-arms to take him into custody, which was forthwith executed.

Mr. Hilliard moved that the arrested members be permitted to take their seats, on paying the fees of arrest, except such as wish to offer excuses for their absence. This motion prevailed, and the members proceeded to offer their excuses.

About a dozen members were excused, and the remainder paid the fees incurred by their arrest.

On motion of Mr. Vinton, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Root in the chair, and took up the Civil Appropriation Bill, and considered the amendments. An amendment displacing Gideon Wells from the Bureau, and requiring a naval captain to fill the station without extra pay, by which $1,000 per annum would be saved, was adopted.

On the 14th, after the transaction of the usual preliminary business, on motion of Mr. Botts, the House took up the Military Bill with the amendments made by the Senate, postponing the selection of General officers till the 4th of March next.

A debate ensued upon the amendment, in which Messrs. Jones, of Tenn., Botts, Paschall, Haralson and others participated.

The debate was continued for the space of three hours, when Mr. Botts moved that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate, in order that Committees of Conference between the two Houses should be appointed.

This proposition prevailed, and a Committee of Conference on the part of the House was appointed.

The House agreed to the amendments of the Senate, giving three months' extra pay to the volunteers.

On the 15th, after the transaction of some routine business, Mr. Conger, of Pennsylvania, moved that ten thousand copies of the proceedings of the Chicago Convention, and the memorials to Congress, and the report of the Committee on Commerce made on the same, to whose it had been referred, together with the resolutions, &c., accompanying the said report, be printed for the use of the House, which was agreed to.

Several ineffectual motions were made, with a view to inquire into the delay attending the printing of the Patent Office Reports, with other reports, &c.

On the 17th, after the usual preliminary business, Mr. Cocke submitted a resolution, calling on the President for information as to the amount of moneys paid to General Gen. Taylor, discriminating between their regular salaries and such extra pay as might have been allowed them, and also whether any charges made in their accounts with the government had been disputed and subsequently paid. Adopted.

Mr. Bowlin submitted a joint resolution giving to the State of Missouri the cannon captured at the battle of Sacramento by the Missouri Volunteer Regiment, under the command of Col. Doniphan. Adopted.

On motion of Mr. Evans, of Ohio, a resolution submitted by him was adopted, directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire and report upon the expediency of reducing the navy to a peace establishment.

Mr. Kaufman moved to suspend the rules, in order that he might call up the bill establishing post routes, but on the yeas and nays being called, it was lost.

Mr. Burt submitted a resolution calling upon the President for information in regard to the number of Indians now in Oregon, New Mexico and California, how many military posts, and what amount of troops to garrison them would be required in order to maintain peace and secure settlers from hostile attacks. Adopted.

Mr. Hillyer's resolution, calling upon the President for information in relation to the instructions to Messrs. Sevier and Clifford was adopted.

Mr. Lahm moved to suspend the rules, that he might submit a resolution directing the Committee on Territories to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a Territory or State for the black population. The suspension of the rules was lost, only 101 voting in the affirmative.

The House agreed to the Senate's amendment to the Pension Bill, extending the act five years.

Items of News.

INFEBIORITY TO NATAGHIN.—In the case of Marshes, Palmer and others, Judge Smith, of the New York Marine Court, has decided that a Notary cannot protest a note when he himself does not present it. That a public officer cannot delegate his authority, as such, to an agent, unless there is a law expressly authorizing him to do so. In the case above alluded to, the Notary's Clerk presented the note and gave the notice, the Notary making the protest from the statements of the clerk.

QUAKE.—A large crack has taken place on the Northern part of the eminence upon which the citadel of Quebec is situated, which has caused great terror among the inhabitants of that part of the city. It appears to have been caused by the lightning, and if it should go much further, it is not all impossible, that part of the cliff will fall and bury the people of a part of the Rue Champlain in its ruins. The inhabitants of these houses are moving out with all possible haste.

GOING TEN TIMES ROUND THE WORLD.—The Portsmouth Journal chronicles the death of Mr. John Mendum, aged 56, for many years in the employ of the Eastern Stage Company, as driver from Portsmouth to Boston. The Journal says, "probably no other man in New England has driven so many miles." He passed more than six thousand times to and from Portsmouth and Boston, equal in distance to going ten times round the world.

PUBLIC SPEAKING.—Some of the reporters state that Daniel Webster speaks at the rate of from one hundred and ten words per minute; Geerit Smith from seventy to ninety; Dr. Tyng from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and forty; Mr. Botts from one hundred to one hundred and twenty; Mr. Clay from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and sixty; Mr. Choate and Mr. Calhoun from one hundred and sixty to two hundred.

ANOTHER FALL IN THE PRICE OF BREAD.—Yesterday evening, the bakers throughout the metropolis lowered the price of the 4 lb. loaf one half penny. Those of the 8 lb. loaf now only charge 9d. for the best quality; the second rate 8d. and 8½d. Many, however, in populous districts, are selling it at 8d., weighed on delivery.—London Paper.

NEW TERRITORY.—Oregon is said to contain 218,538,240 acres; California and New Mexico contain 500,000 square miles. These and other territories of the Union equal at least 1,000,000 miles, or 500,000,000 square acres.

PARIS AS IS IS.—Kendall, of the Picayune, says that he had to wait a whole week in Paris, before he could get a pair of boots which he had ordered—the workmen being constantly called from their work by the cannon.

A CHEMICAL MARVELLOUS.—At the Troy Conference of the P. E. Methodist Church, last week, Rev. Mr. Sprague, of Amsterdam, New York, was expelled from the ministry for being a mesmerizer.

☞ Ninety-nine sheep were burnt or suffocated to death in a car on the Connecticut River Railroad, on Wednesday week. A spark from the locomotive set fire to the straw in the sheep car.

☞ General Cushing, it is said, will be the Democratic candidate for Governor in Massachusetts.

LATEST NEWS!

FROM MEXICO.

The insurrectionary movement of Paredes still continues; but the Government appears confident of its ability to master the insurgents. Paredes is said to be favored by the priesthood, which body is believed to be inclined towards the placing of a foreign Prince upon the throne. Probably Louis Philippe could be got for the occasion. Though unable to keep the Parisians in order, he might manage the Mexicans. Metternich might be obtained for Prime Minister, as Guizot and Louis Philippe have quarrelled.

The American quarters, in pay of the Mexican Government, came near assassinating their Mexican commander, recently. No great dependence can be placed upon traitors.

Nearly all the volunteers and the ten regiments had reached Vera Cruz, and were rapidly embarking on the transports bound for New Orleans and other portsof the U. States.

The Legislature of Tamaulipas had demanded two millions of dollars from the Federal Government as indemnity for loss of territory beyond the Rio Grande, by the Treaty of Guadalupe.

The Mexican Government had appropriated $200,000 to the relief of Yucatan. Paredes had addressed the States for aid to the eight thousand Yucatanese who took refuge in Mexico and Campeachy, to escape the Indians.

It is reported from Tampico, that the Mexican Government had sent a force to take possession of Tampico, but that the citizens had refused to permit their entrance. It is thought that the citizens favor the revolutionary movement of Paredes and Jarauta.

THE SENATE'S COMMITTEE.

It is rumored at Washington that a majority of the Select Committee of the Senate have decided upon reporting the three bills for the establishment of Territorial Governments in California, New Mexico and Oregon, in one, without the Wilmot Proviso. Thus leaving the question of slavery to the inhabitants of those Territories.

GENERAL PILLOW.

The nomination of G. J. Pillow, as a Major General in the Army, has been confirmed by the Senate.

Clippings.

☞ Don't throw your opinions in everybody's teeth. You may set it down as orthodox, (although it sounds like a paradox,) that the more freely you bestow your opinions on your neighbor, the less opinion he will have of you.

☞ "A place for every thing, and every thing in its place," said an old lady, when she stowed the broom, bellows, balls of yarn, cards, caps, rireycomb, three cats, and a gridiron into an old oven.

☞ "Stevie used to say, "The most accomplished way of using books is to serve them as most people do lords—learn their titles, and then brag of their acquaintance."

☞ Private bankruptcy is almost universal in France. A letter writer from Paris says that unless some miracle is done in its favor, the country cannot escape National bankruptcy.

☞ Nature teaches us that we are all dependent—that we are like cog-wheels, pushing each other along by filling up hollows. Proverbial Cant.

☞ A slip of the foot you may soon recover—but a slipp of the tongue you can never get over.

☞ We never knew a man disposed to scorn the humble, who was not himself a fit object of scorn to the poorest.

☞ A man in Louisiana plants cucumbers and "waters" them with "vinegar," the vines produce excellent pickles, the Crescent City says.

☞ It is said that the Sultan has ordered a case of chloroform for the Turkish seraglio. Is this to supersede the sack and string?

☞ Extract from a young lady's letter, found in the pocket of George W. Taft, now in the Worcester House of Correction for stealing. "Oh, George, if I only had you here, how I would hug you."

☞ The bear-joke we have seen for some time, is that paragraph of Prentice's, on the Louisville Journal, extolling Mr. Marcy, of the War Department, and dwelling with rapture on his military quality, and finally mentioning as an instance of his valor, "his unprecedented charge on the State of New York."

☞ A "sewing machine" has been devised, a young girl, with thin, pale face, attenuated form, dressed in a dark calico dress, faded dark shawl, dirty straw bonnet, and green veil.

☞ "Why, Tom, my dear fellow, how old you look!" "Dare say, Bob, for the fact is, I never was so old before in all my life."

☞ In Austria, bankruptcies are seldom over five per in length. When a gentleman, stopping at a hotel, goes to bed, one of the servants doubles him up like a jack-knife, and rolls him in a sheet and blanket.

☞ The St. Louis Republican says, a Mr. Harrison, of that city, has invented an omnibus which he intends to propel by steam.

☞ The Trenton News announces the death of a boy by drowning, and adds, "He was the only child of his mother, and she was a widow."

☞ "Why do Miss Mary Jane Smith wish at all," said an odd fellow the other day, "or, if I did, I'll tell ye what I'd wish—I'd wish that I had a two bushel bag full of needles, and all them air needles warn clean up to the eye in making bugs, and all them air bugs clerk full of needles, and I'd be the chap to wrap them up in a pillow and a coward.

☞ A boy at the Latin school, in our city, in reciting a lesson in the classics, the other day, translated the passage "Pompey the great, of mode, Cneus pulsus et interdum" the following bold and spirited rendering: "Pompey ate clams by night, Cneus by the pollut and in the day time." We need not say, the worthy teacher flushed.

☞ The Western Times says, "Berlin states that both sides of the Spree, and as the people are considered to be a lively witty race, it may be from this circumstance that young fellows in England, going forth for pleasure and frolicking amusements, are said to be on the spree."

☞ "Adelaide," says the South Australian Register, "is a city without a pump! and the victim of intemperance finds one excuse in his alleged repugnance to imbibe the impure and unfiltered water of the Torrens."

☞ The Dunscombe-Sunfish cale attention to the following erudite epistle, addressed to the Priest of Vesuvius: "Sir,—I hasten to inform you that we had an eclipse of the moon in our village yesterday evening. The rest of the sky was perfectly tranquil. Yours, Mayor of Lyon."

☞ "M. Guizot," remarks the Daily News, "lasted Louis Philippe eight years. The Republic consumed Lamartine in two months."

☞ At a baker's, at the west end of London, any lady or gentleman, so disposed, may step in and have, as we are informed by a notice over the door, his or her "vitals baked."

☞ Literature is at a stand still in France. The number of libraries, great and small, that are now in Paris, passes all belief, says a French paper. In every corner of the city, and even upon the pavements of the streets, books of every kind are spread out, and offered at shamefully low prices.

☞ They have a very "free and easy way" of perpetrating matrimony on the prairies. A western paper states that the ceremony was performed last week in a house in one party was one John Paris, and in the other Miss Lina Jolly, who, taking a liberty to each other, hitched teams, and departed together for Oregon!

☞ Last Sabbath having recently arrived in Paris from London, contrived to obtain access to the interior of the Tuileries, and get possession of certain papers belonging to Louis Philippe, which the Ex-King had secreted in a spot accessible only to himself or those in the secret.

☞ There is a picture exhibiting in the store windows, of an Irish "hod-carrier," staggering on her his load—it is entitled the "Greek" Slave, and at the head of it is styled a "Great Picture, by (title) Powers!"

☞ We have nothing to say about the fashions this week, except that in pants the Bowery style is "forty-two inches round the bottom," still prevails to a serious extent in this community.

☞ "I'll give you a poke in the eye," as the thread remarked to the needle.

☞ Whether the Court understand you to say, Mr. Jones, that you saw the editor of the August of Freedom intoxicated?" "Not at all, sir—I merely said that I have seen him frequently so flustered in his mind that he mistook the door of his cellar with the mouth, that's all."

☞ Dr. Hutchinson, of London, has invented an instrument, named Spirometer, for testing the breathing power, with a view to detect pulmonary disease in its incipient stage.

☞ In central Chili no rain falls for nine months in the year. In Southern Chili rain falls only one in two or three years. The Peruvian Andes commence at degree of South latitude. They are separated for 1,200 miles from the Pacific by a sandy desert, about sixty miles broad, upon which a drop of rain never falls.

☞ "I say, Mr. Johnson, did you hear 'bout de catabiby that hotel Philis?" "Oh course I didn't, wat was it?" "You see, de doctor ordered a blister on her chist—well, so she hadn't no chist, so he put her on de backbone, and it drawed her new pink bonnet all out ob shape, and spile um entirely."

☞ The following is a Frenchman's definition of a broker:—Ah! ma make von discoverie. Vat is de raison vat fere de peopelle call de agent broker? It is bekouse van do personne have beaucoup wid him he become broke.

☞ Mr. Stephens, of New York, the distinguished traveller and author, has been surveying or rather examining the route across the Isthmus from Chagres to Panama, and he reports most favorably upon it.

☞ There is a man in Boston who was so large when a babe, that it was impossible to name him all at once. He was laid on his left side, when they called him Sam, and as soon as they could turn him over he was named Isaiahbe. A middle name was intended for him, but his body was so round, it wouldn't stay. Oh!

"WHAT think you best one's choice of law exhaustS? The draft of an Attorney's bill of costs."

☞ Before the Maine Legislature, recently, a petition for change of name was urged by a man, whose name was as bad as his personal credit. In presenting it, he said that he was not very particular as to the new name, which he trusted might be awarded him, but he hoped the Legislature would give him one that would go at the banks.

AN ASPIRE should in utterance die,
Or if written, but faintly appear;
Only breed through the burst of a sigh,
Only read through the blot of a tear!

☞ THE NEW ORLEANS Picayune says that mosquitoes are like doctors—they never "let blood" without "running up a bill."

THEY my tame eyes like sunny skies,
They chief attraction form;
I see no meaning in those eyes,
They take one all by storm.

☞ A careless compositor lately dissolved the Union by transposing two letters, whereby the United States became Untied States.

Miscellaneous.

DIABOLISM.

The atrocities committed by some of the French insurrectionists were truly diabolical. "A young lieutenant of the mounted Garde Mobile, M. Pingret, who, at the head of the 4th company of the 19th battalion, attacked the barricades of the Faubourg Poissonniere, where he was wounded, declares that the insurgents, after having placed an officer, who had been taken prisoner, between two planks, cut off his head! From other prisoners they tore out their eyes!

"You will read, perhaps without believing, accounts of Frenchmen, in the middle of the nineteenth century, butchering Frenchmen by thousands—of their shooting, hanging, beating to death, and even sawing in pieces and mutilating, while yet living, prisoners and wounded men of them. You may, I say, read all this without credence, and yet your incredulity will be misplaced.

"Numbers of the Garde Mobile were found in the Pantheon, after its capture, hung up by the wrists, and pierced with bayonets and swords. A company of National Guards in the city, were forced into a huge oven for baking pottery, after which a fire was kindled beneath; fortunately a re-capture was made in time to relieve the soldiers from their horrible situation. In the Faubourg Poissonniere, a soldier is said to have been impaled and disembowelled, in the presence of his comrades! An officer of the line, had both hands cut off—a dragoon, had both feet cut off, and in this horrible condition suffered to die. Several women were arrested who had sold poisoned brandy to the soldiers.

"One of the women arrested, has had the horrible frankness to avow that she cut off the heads of three Gardes Mobiles. Her companions in the operating caps were stuck. The mouth of one was filled with pitch, and a lighted match was placed in it, and the wretches who did this, danced around with horrible joy, roaring—'Des lampions! des lampions!'

"All the insurgents showed the same villainous spirit; they killed men whom they had robbed, after taking them prisoners; in some instances, no doubt, persons unmixed with the contest, drawn to it by curiosity. They cut off the hands of a Captain of Chasseurs, and, like ghoul-slowly away. The Garde Mobile, to avenge the cowardly assassination of some prisoners, went into a house from which the shots were fired, and threw the persons they found there out of the windows, saying, 'The wretches are not worthy to be brought in!'

"It is painful and revolting to continue this narrative. Gallopins asserts positively, that on a barricade in the Faubourg St. Antoine, the body of a Garde Republicaine was impaled, and the bowels taken out!

"A female, in female attire, rushed into the Rue Rambuteau, with a sharp knife, stole behind a Mobile Garde, seized him by the nose, and cut his throat from ear to ear. Many staff officers have been taken by the insurgents alive, and were massacred in the most horrible manner. The Pantheon, which was in the possession of the mob during the whole of yesterday. But at all the barricades women were among the most active, and at all the windows they were encouraging the insurgents, giving no quarter, and shouting, 'Down with the dragon of vantage,' hurling the most hideous imprecations against the assailants, and waving their handkerchiefs to incite the insurgents to fresh deeds of valor. In the Faubourg St. Marceau the women threw boiling oil and water from the windows upon the troops.

"During the great fight in the Faubourg du Temple are St. Antoine, the insurgents went to the infant schools, where many parents had sent their children for safety, took the little ones, and placed them before them, that they could not run away, and, in order, to prevent the National Guards from returning the fire, watch the insurgents continued most murderously from behind and between the children.

"In another quarter, one of the insurgents having been taken by the Garde Mobile, these men, infuriated at their inhuman conduct, determined to shoot him, when, at the moment of execution, the moral Brea threw himself before the prisoner, and entreated them by all the laws of war as well as humanity to spare his life. The soldiers, at the bidding of Brea, this noble appeal had scarcely passed his lips, when the ruffianly captive, who stood behind him, pulled out a pistol and shot the General dead. The murderer was instantly put to death amidst yells of fury."

The streets of Paris, during the recent insurrection, literally ran with blood. We stated by the London correspondent of the N. Y. Commercial, that one corps of National Guards from the country, which was marching into the city, suddenly with drew, amidst the laughter and execrations of the Garde Mobile, terrified at the blood pouring along the streets, of which the latter have been indeed the National Assembly, that "the pavements of Paris had never before been reddened by so much blood."

Varieties.

"SLEEPS LIKE A TOP."—This familiar phrase which is applied to persons completely under the influence of Morphine, is erroneously supposed to be derived from the pause of a pegging-top when its rotatory motion is at its height, or, as school boys call it, "when it is asleep." But the supposition is erroneous, for the phrase is derived from the Italian word topo, which signifies a mouse, and is applied as the generic name of the common field mouse, from which the Italian proverb is derived—"He sleeps like a top."

HYDROPHOBIA.—The virus of hydrophobia is terribly subtile. The bite of the animal is not required. There is reason to believe that mere contact with the blood of a rabid is sufficient to communicate the disease. We know of an instance, in which a little girl pursued by a rabid dog, jumped upon a fence. The dog sprang upon her, but failing to bite, tore her apron. He was killed shortly after, and the little girl, sewing up the rent the next morning, died, and died of hydrophobia.—N. Y. Dispatch.

MUSIC.—According to Prof. Johnstone, the time and frequency of milking have a great influence on the amount of butter yielded by milk. If a cow be milked only once a day, he says, the milk will yield a seventh part more butter than an equal quantity of that which is obtained by two milkings in the day. When the milk is drawn three times a day, it is more abundant, but still less rich. It has also been remarked, that the morning's milk is the richest, and that which is obtained in the evening.

MRS. PARTINGTON'S LAST.—"Don't lay in that pastur', dear," said Mrs. Partington to her nephew, who was stretched upon a sofa with his heels a little higher than his head. "Don't lay so, raise yourself up and put this pillow under you. I know a young man once who had a suggestion of the brain in consequence of laying an—his brains all run down into his head" and with the adhesive energy he left him to his nap in the little back sitting-room.

GENTILITY.—A chap from the country, dining one day at a city friend's, who ranked among the most fashionable of the "upper ten," desired a little more sauce on his pudding. Thinking this word too common or vulgar, for such a place and occasion, he astonished the presiding goddess of the table by genteelizing it thus—"If you please, ma'am, I'll trouble you for a spoonful or two of your impudence!"

YOUTHFUL CANDOR.—A plasterer and his boy being employed in white-washing a house by the day, was so zealous that the owner one day asked the lad in his master's absence, when they thought they would have done. The boy bluntly replied that his master was looking out for another job, and as they lived next door they should make an end that week.

FAIR SEX AT A DISCOUNT.—A newly married young woman was recently led by a halter round her neck, through the public market in Whitney, Georgia, her new pink bonnet all out of shape, and spile um entirely."

MARRIAGE.—The publisher of the Lowell Offering states, in the number for this month, that in one mill, during the past eighteen years, eighty-two of the "boys," and four hundred and five "girls" employed there, have been married; and from another mill, one hundred and eighty-seven of the girls have been married during five years; and from a single room in another corporation, twenty-eight were married in one year.

A QUESTION FOR A SYNOD.—The ladies of Edinburgh having made a present of gown and bands to the Moderator of the United Presbyterian Synod, an Elder from Stirling put the ugly question as to what passage of Scripture authorized the use of such a garment. One man—a tailor not the wisest—may put a question which a whole Synod cannot answer.—Gateshead Observer.

TRIPLE INTOXICATION.—M. d'Arpentigny (Medical Times) represents Germany as exalted by the triple intoxication of contemplation, music, and tobacco. People live gravely there, and dream enormously. They drink out of large glasses; they read large books.

A gentleman from Vermont writes as follows:

Cambridge, Vermont, June 18, 1848.

Mr. Seth W. Fowle,

Dear Sir—For several years past, my usually good health has been occasionally interrupted by spells of coughing produced by colds; a year ago last winter I was brought to the verge of the grave by a very severe cough accompanied with severe pains on both sides, between the shoulders, etc., which then long continued night sweats, and other alarming symptoms, reduced me so low that my friends despaired of my recovery. I consulted physicians, and tried the various remedies of the day, but none of them cured me. At last I procured Dr. WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY, and it saved my life; I have not enjoyed better health for many years, therefore I can recommend others who need it to try it.

SAMUEL BENTLEY.

For sale by Charles Schaffer No. 415 Market street, Frederick Brown, corner of Fifth and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia, and by Druggists generally throughout the United States and British Provinces. 11

The Markets.

PHILADELPHIA MARKETS.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, July 15, 1848.

FLOUR AND MEAL.—The supplies of more descriptions of Breadstuffs continue very light, but the demand generally is on the most limited scale, and prices of Flour have continued pretty steady. Sales of 600 bbls common standard brands at $5.25@5.37½ for Western and Pennsylvania—chiefly at the lowest rates, and for city use at $5.50@5 as in quality. Rye Flour is scarce, and prices have advanced to $3.87½@3.94, with sales at the former price. Corn Meal has been in moderate demand, and some 300 bbls Pennsylvania sold at $4.30@4.37½ for fresh ground, and $3.25 for sound old stock.

GRAIN—Good red Wheat is scarce, but the demand is very moderate, and prices have again given way. Week's sales 10,000 bushels, including only fair to prime Pennsylvania reds at $1.15@1.18 early in the week, since at $1.12@1.15 for prime do, and $1.02@1.10½ for inferior to prime new Southern, and some old Western at $1.20@1.25 per bushel, as to quality. Rye—Market depressed; we note sales of 3000 bushels Pennsylvania at 70@71½c. Corn has been in fair demand, and about 25,000 bushels sold at 51@52c for Southern and Pennsylvania yellow, and 49@51c for white per bushel. Oats have been in request, and 5000 bushels sold at 35@36c for Southern, and 37@38c for Pennsylvania.

PROVISIONS—The market for salted Meats has been very dull, and no sales of moment have transpired; we quote Western Pork at $10.25@11 for Mess, and $8.50@9 for Prime per bbl. Bacon is very scarce, and prices are firm at 5½@6c for Hams, as in quality, 4½@5c for Sides, and 4@4½ for Shoulders. Lard sells in small lots at 7@7½c. Butter and Cheese are slowly at former rates.

BARK—The market for Quercitron has been quiet, and no sales of importance have transpired this week.

BREWMAN—The market is dull with a heavy stock. Sales at one of good yellow at 19½.

CANDLES—Steady sales of Sperm at 30c bbl. In Tallow, no change.

COAL—Anthracite continues in moderate demand at steady prices. We quote Schuylkill White Ash at $3.25@3.31 for Lump; Red Ash $3.30@3.37½; Broken and Screened 25c higher; Lehigh sells at $3.62½ @3.75 per ton for Lump and Prepared Coal. Sales of 2000 bushels Allegheny Bituminous at 12½c.

COFFEE—A cargo of Rio, and one of Laguayra, in all 800 bags changed hands this week on terms not made public, but supposed a reduction lower prices.

COTTON—The market has been very inactive this week, and the sales only reach 675 bales, including Upland, Mobile and New Orleans, at prices within our range. We quote—

| | Upland & Fla. | N Orls & Ala |
|---|---|---|
| Middling, | 5 ¾@ | 5 ¾@ |
| Middling Fair, | 6 ¼@ | 6 ¼@ |
| Fair, | 7 ¼@ | 7 ¼@ |

COPPER—The last sale of Sheathing was at 20½c. 6 mos.

FEATHERS—The demand for Western has been to a limited extent at 33c lb. per lb.

FISH—Mackerel continue dull, with small sales at $7.62½@7.75 for No 1, $6@6.50 for No. 2, and $4.25@4.50 for No 3 per bbl.

GINSENG—The last sale of good Crude was at 20 cts. cash.

HEMP—The market remains very dull.

HIDES—No sales transpired the week.

IRON—Business generally continues inactive, and the sales of Pig Metal have only been 3,400 tons at $26@27 for Anthracite and Charcoal Iron. In manufactured descriptions but little doing. A sale of Scotch Pig at $25 per ton, on time.

LUMBER—There has been but little doing this week, but we hear of no change in prices. Shipped coastwise the Lehigh region for the week ending the 8th inst.

| | Feet. |
|---|---|
| Previously this season, | 171,708 |
| | 11,496,262 |
| Total, | 12,476,520 |

MOLASSES—Market generally quiet—a cargo of 300 bbls Muscovado sold at 25c cash.

NAVAL STORES—No sales of magnitude have occurred in articles under this head since our last weekly review. Spirits of Turpentine is worth 37c 12 mos.

OILS—Linseed has been in fair demand, with sales to some extent at 31@33c. Whale has been in some demand, and five sales made at 35@37c. Small sales of Sperm at previous prices. Lard is steady.

PLASTER—Further cargo sales at $2.25@2.37½ per ton.

SEEDS—The market remains quiet. Sales in lots at $2.30@2.35 for good to prime Cloverseed, and a small parcel at $4. Flaxseed is dull at $1.37½ per bushel.

SPIRITS—No change in the prices of Brandy, Gin or Rum, of which the entire stock here is very limited. Whiskey is dull in source, and prices have advanced—sales at 22½@23c, closing at the latter rate—300 bbls sold at 23c.

TALLOW—Market dull. We quote Rendered at 7½c, which is a decline.

TEAS—The market continues inactive.—Bull. Reporter.

THE STOCK MARKET.

The following were the closing prices of stocks on Monday last:

| | Bid | Asked | | Bid | Asked |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| U S 6s 1862 | 101 | 101½ | N Liberty | 40 | 45 |
| U S 6s 1868 | 104 | 104½ | Morris Canal | 24½ | 25 |
| do | 104 | 104½ | Southwark | 75 | |
| do | 104 | 105½ | Penna R'd | 54½ | 55 |
| do 5s | 99 | 99½ | Girard | 17½ | 18 |
| Philada 6s | 95 | 96 | Western | 42½ | 50 |
| do 5s |

Selected Poetry.

A BALLAD.

MARTIN PARQUHER TUPPER TO BROTHER JONATHAN.

A LOVING BALLAD.

ALNWICK, (England,) June 8, 1849.

Hi! brother, I'm a Britisher,
A chip of heart of oak,
That wouldn't warp or crawve or sir
From what I thought or spoke;
And you—a blunt and honest man,
Straightforward, kind and true,—
I tell you, brother Jonathan,
That you're a Briton, too.

I know your heart, an open heart,
I read your mind and will,
A grey-hound ever on the start
To run for honor still.
And shrewd to scheme a likely plan,
And most to see it done;
I tell you, Brother Jonathan,
That you and I are one.

There may be jealousies and strife,
For men have selfish ends,
But petty quarrels gingor life
And help to mend friends;
And pardon who with solemn mien
Judge humans most aright,
Decide it, very Jonathan,
That brothers always fight.

Two fledging sparrows in one nest,
Will chirp about a worm;
Then how should eagles meekly rest,
The children of the storm!
No! while their rented pinions fan
The eyrie's dizzy side,
Like you and me, my Jonathan,
It's all for love and pride.

"God save the Queen!" delights you still,
And "British Grenadiers,"
The good old notes your heart-strings thrill,
And catch you by both ears;
And we—ah John or if you can,
For we are proud of you—
We like you, Brother Jonathan,
And Yankee Doodle, too!

There's nothing foreign on your face,
Nor strange upon your tongue
You cause not of another race
From brave lineage sprung;
No, brother, though away you ran,
As true boys will do,
Still true it is, young Jonathan,
My fathers fathered you.

Time was—it was not long ago,
Your grandsires were with mine,
To battle nations, blow for blow,
For England's royal line
Or trapped to court to kiss Queen Anne,
Or worship mighty Boss;
And you and I, good Jonathan,
Went with them then, I guess

Together both, brave long ago,
Among the roes fought,
Or charging fierce the Paynim foe,
Did all knight errants ought;
As Cavalier or Puritan
Together prayed or swore,
For John's sake Brother Jonathan
Was only John of yore!

There lived a man, a man of men,
A king on fancy's throne,
We never shall see his like again,
The globe is all his own;
And if we claim him of our clan,
The half belongs to you,
For Shakspeare, happy Jonathan,
Is yours, and ours, too!

There was another glorious name
A peer for all time,
Who gained the double-fleet of fame,
The beautiful—the sublime!
And let us talk him as we one,
More modest than pert,
The Yankee, Brother Jonathan,
Cries Believe in Milton's self!

Well, well; and every praise of old
That makes us immortal sit,
You would be just and aids be bold
To share it it you will.
Since England's glory first began,
Time—but the other day,
The half is yours! but, Jonathan,
Way did you run away?

Oh, brother, could we both be one,
In union and in name,
How gladly would I run—I very am
Lie backing in our fame!
In either world toland the van
And go ahead for good,
While cents, to John and Jonathan,
Tinds tribute gratitude!

Add has your stripes and golden stars
To brave St. George's cross,
And serve dream of minus wars,
Two dancers' minus dross,
Let us two bless when others lan.
And love when others hate
And so, my cordial Jonathan,
We'll, I, celebrate.

What more? I touch not bullet strings,
A bullet strain to win,
Nor glance a prophets, priests, and kings,
Or heavyly kin and sin;
As friend with friend, and man with man,
Oh let our hearts be thus,
As Dacrd's love to Jonathan
So Jonathan's to us!

Humorous Sketches.

THE GEORGIAN IN NEW YORK

BY ROBERT M. CHARLTON.

[The following sketches, either in parts, upon our Georgia friends, but as the author appears to be a Georgian, and as the fun is capital, we do not think the most sensitive of his fellow citizens can take offence at it.]

Reader, if you live any where south of latitude 30, and if you wish to preserve a high estimate of your native land, and sell, take my advice, and stay at home. You will find, before you are a thousand miles off, your self-existimation considably wanted, and you will ascertain to your intense desire, that you think more of your own state than those North of you do. At least, that is my experience; and if you have a few minutes to spare, read my "simple tale," and sympathize with my misfortunes.

When I was a very young man, (it would be exceedingly impertinent for you to ask how long ago,) I left Savannah in a vessel bound for New York. We were all well when we started, but after we had been a few days out, an August sun began to do duty with our crew. One man died, and another became very sick. On the morning of the sixth day, we reached the "Highlands," and our captain called a council of war, among the passengers, to consult as to the course we ought to adopt, in reference to our sick seaman; "for," said he, "the health officer at the Quarantine ground hates Georgia, for the trouble it gives him, and if he finds any body looking the least pale, he will put us under the yellow flag for a week." We overhauled our sick man, put clean garments upon him, shaved him, and telling him to keep a "stiff upper lip," and not to let the doctors suspect his indisposition, we constituted him rook pro hac vice, and propping him up in the "wheelhouse," steered, with some trepidation, our "medical defiance." We anchored at Staten Island, and in a few minutes a boat, with a yellow flag flying at the stern, came up.

"Where are you from?" said a handsome looking young man in glasses.

"Georgia, sir," answered the captain. "Ah, here's trouble for me, I'll be bound," muttered Esculapius, as he came on board; "Master your passengers, sir," added he. We all passed in review. "Call the crew forward." Done accordingly."

"Where is John Matthews?" asked Medicus, calling the roll. (That question was easier asked than answered, however, for he was out dead man, and we had thrown him into the sea.)

"We have lost him at sea, sir," responded the captain; "we have had some severe weather."

"John Jones?" This was our cook pro tempore. "Mallon, cook! come out!" No answer. "He can not very well leave the caboose, at present, doctor, he's engaged; but if it's necessary to see him, perhaps you can slide down the lazy to step down." "Here he went, our poor fellow, hoisting his shoulders, and cross shafting and propping, were the individual marks of sixth disease. We saw at once that our artifice was "no go" with the physician. He told Jonathan and me, and then said quietly to his assistant: "Take the man to the hospital, he has got that unmanly Georgia fever." "What do you mean, sir," said I, "by coupling Georgia with such an adjective?" Mr. Medical met me with perfect amazement. At last he turned his hat to me, and replied, "I beg your pardon, sir—I ought not to have coupled Georgia fever with so contemptuous an expression, for I have no doubt the H has done an more good in its time—I wish it a more extended circulation for the benefit of mankind. If you will alone me, I will recant my hasty word, and declare that the cook has got the blessed Georgia fever. Will that suit you?"

"No, it did not; but what could I say? I had just abused the man for naming the Georgia fever, and I could not, therefore, object to his blessing. Mr. Medicus, although I could not help feeling that the time was worse than the first, and that his meaning was, that if it killed all the Georgians, it would be a benefactor to mankind. My friend saw that he had one at a disadvantage, and leering at me through his glasses, (I hate a man who wears spectacles—I have known some honest men who used them, but I never saw a dishonest man who did not,) continued his consolations to his assistant. "Take that man to the hospital, Mr. Smith, and tell the carpenter to have his coffin ready by the time to-morrow. And tell him also to get another, of about five feet ten inches (looking at my height) ready for the day after, as there are some preconsitory symptoms in one of the passengers."

"I saw you put a proper reliance on your skill, doctor," said I to him, "but you need not trouble yourself about that last coffin. There will be no use for it. I shall not take your physic." His laughed heartily, and shook me by the hand. "You may go to town, captain," were his farewell words as he left the vessel. We disagreeably learned that the sick chief chief was thus designated.

After reaching the city, I strolled to one of the banks, upon which I had a draft, presented it, and received my money. The dole, Sir, of the "hard hold, of course, where I was from, and I saw that the teller sneered as he read it.

"Can I leave this on deposit, sir?" asked I of him.

"No," answered the little Yankee, talking through his nose, "not unless you are introduced to our cashier by a gentleman. We don't care about receiving Georgia deposits."

"Look here, mosquer," said I, (putting my hat on one side of my head, in regular Georgia fashion, and talking through my nose,) "if your cashier wants to be introduced to a gentleman, I have no objection to making his acquaintance. Call him, and I will give him a chance he seldom gets; but if you mean that I am to find another gentleman in New York, all I have to say is, I don't work miracles."

"I see," answered he, "that your qualifications for the discovery are not very great, but we decline the deposit without a compliance with the rule."

By this time I began to ascertain that Georgia was not held in the highest repute in that region, and I became a little more humble and subdued in my future negotiations. One of my objects in visiting New York was to insure my life, and to this purpose I now directed my attention, taking the precaution, however, of "working the miracle" of "finding a gentleman" to introduce me—one of my former Georgia friends. We went together to the Insurance Office, where he introduced me to the President, and I stated my object.

"Ah," said he, (this speaks volumes,) "you, sir. To see a man of your years, of such deep reflection, of such prudent foresight, is delightful, is gratifying—it denotes a high state of civilization, sir, a very high state—it is an excellent commentary upon the character of the people where you live." (Huzza for Georgia, thought I, here is a man at last who can appreciate her.) "Yes, sir, we will insure you with pleasure; I like your looks, sir, much, very much!" (What a sensible man, thought I.) "you are a little pale, but so much the better, it denotes temperance. Yes, sir, we will insure you at the lowest rates. Mr. Nicoll," (addressing the secretary,) "get a blank in common form, and come here and fill up a policy on the life of Judge ———, I think Mr. B——— called you so, sir?"

"Yes, sir," answered I, with a great deal of satisfaction, "I am a judge." (I should like to see the man in Georgia, who is not, or has not been a judge.)

"Ah," resumed he, "your community are indeed civilized. I see they rise superior to vulgar prejudices; they do not estimate a man's worth by his years. Youth, sir, youth is the very age of wisdom—possions a little excitable, it is true, sir, there are no stubborn, rooted, prejudices given to age. Solomon sir, Solomon, was quite young when he commenced his writings—we shall hear of you hereafter, sir, no doubt. Mr. Nicoll, you need not ask the usual questions. The looks of the gentleman are enough. Fill out the policy for life at one per cent, for Judge ———, of Vermont—I think you said Vermont, sir?"

"No, sir," answered I, considerably abashed, "I said Georgia, sir."

My dear reader, I have no doubt you have seen instances of sudden surprise in your time; a man, for instance, in the midst of a waltz, with a fair confiding one hanging on his arms, "going it through all the mazes, and just at the instant that he was executing his most graceful whirl, having it whispered to him, by some good natured friend that his confidential clerk had absconded with all his money, and ruined his house; or a lawyer who had been kept from his usual stimulants for a week, because he could not get them, and, in his haste and anxiety, mistaking a gill of aquafortis, for his loved liquor, and swallowing it; perhaps you have seen some slight astonishment of this kind, but either would give you but a faint idea of the petrified look that the worthy President put on when he heard that terrible word Georgia. He could not utter a syllable for some time. At last he said in a subdued tone:

"This is a bad business"—and then added, "Are you determined on effecting this policy, sir? Have you considered the expense?"

"Certainly, I have; I understood you to say that you would insure any amount, at one per cent."

"Ah, I was mistaken, I misunderstood the first from whence you came. We rank Georgia a extra hazardous. We charge two per cent., sir, we could rather not take the risk at any rate. Do you think you are rather young, sir, to commence this precautious life?"

"No, sir," answered I, "I have thought well on the subject, I am not a robust man, by any means, so you may see by my complexion, although as you correctly observed just now, my features indicated temperance, and are therefore in my favor."

"I spoke hastily, sir," said he, "paleness does not always in that latitude denote temperance However, as I said I would insure you, I will keep my word. As a personal favor I would be glad if you would name a low sum."

"I name $20,000, then," said I. He regarded me in mute astonishment.

"Twenty thousand, sir! Are thousand is our highest Georgia risk."

It was my turn to show astonishment.

"Why, sir," exclaimed I, "they told me that every acre of ground in Wall-street is worth $6,000. Do you value two acres of Georgia with a soul and spirit tacked to them, at less than one foot of Wall Street?"

"We value things as we please, sir, and if you don't like our terms, we will close this interview."

"I must submit," said I. "make it five thousand."

"Take your pen, Mr. Nicoll, and add a clause in the margin, that if the gentleman falls in a duel the policy shall be void."

"I have no objection," said I, smiling. "I am a peaceable, quiet man, and apart from that, my status mosks keep me from fighting."

"And, Mr. Nicoll," resumed he, "add also, that if the gentleman falls by his own hands, the policy shall be void."

I smiled again. "You are taking unnecessary trouble, my good sir; I shall make no attempt on my life."

"And Mr. Nicoll," continued he, "just add, that if the insured falls by the hand of Justice, (i. e., by the hangman,) the risk shall terminate." It was added—the policy was signed and the premium paid, and as I left him, I gave him a parting thrust.

"That last clause about the hands of Justice, sir is a fictious surplusage. I have lived in Georgia since and boy, my whole life, and I never heard a case of such a thing as Justice there. You forget, sir, we are in a high state of civilization there, appreciating merit in youth, and above the prejudices of age Good morning, sir."

He sighed and bowed, and I left him, determined to hail from Vermont until I reached latitude 35 and then to take care not to hail from Vermont lest I should fall "by the hands of Justice," and vacate the policy.

It is recorded in Joe Miller, page 56, that a Hibernian backslider, had a wager with one of his companions, that the latter could not put him in a hot, and carry him up a ladder, to the top of a lofty house. A shilling was the amount of the bet, and the task was successfully accomplished "I've won yet," said the carrier, "give me the shilling." "Faith and so you have," answered his load, "but, Pat, when you reached the third story, your foot slipped, and then I had great hopes he would fall."

The time has nearly arrived for the expiration of the risk on my life, and I suppose that the New York Company will pocket all the premium money no loss—but last year, in passing through the county of E———, I got a fever, and then (as my Hibernian friend said,) I had great hopes of being taken to—Ocean Magazine.

"DUPONT'S BEST."

One cold morning in last February, the snow lying some two inches deep on the ground, a circle of "loose loafers" in front of a "grocery" kindled the fire in Mr. ——'s stove. They had got in conjunction every newspaper in the room, and as the number was considerable, and each was anxious to get as near as possible to the source of comfort, the closed, unique circle of chair backs formed a sort of rampart against cold, which, without some one should move, all ingress to the fire was cut off, as though it were under quarantine. And the sentimentals tuts of legs and feet turning inwards towards the hearth, looked like the spokes of an enormous wagon wheel. Even the landlord was excluded, and with his hands in his pockets, Mr. M., was continually promenading his hot-room endeavoring to look as good natured and as comfortable as circumstances would permit.

In this state of things, Dr. Z., of our town, entered, rubbing his hands and pronounced energetically several monosyllabic words, in connection with some quite original observations on the state of the weather. But in vain did he, with blue nose and benevolent look, walk round the semicircle or kind hearted neighbors to get access to the fire; not a soul moved.

"By the lows it's cold!" at length exclaimed the Doctor, by way of drawing attention to his forsaken condition.

"Hey! cold did yer say?" answered one, carelessly; "yes, I should think likely it is, out in the street," and he coolly gave his chair a hitch, in the unsuccessful effort to get it a half inch nearer the fire.

Now, Dr. Z., though one of the best hearted men in the world, is exceedingly irritable; and while so fond of a joke as Curran was, is known as a perfect dare-devil, capable of anything. After a moment's waiting he left the room, muttered something expressive of his private opinion as to the state of civilization in that town. Crossing the street to a store, he put neatly up a bundle, some nine inches by nine in size, in one corner of which he put about a spoonful of "Dupont's Best."

Re-entering the bar-room, he tipped the landlord a sly wink, and then, by a personal appeal, prevailed upon the most good-natured member of the group to move his chair immediately, so as to admit Z. within the circle; a movement which the rest repaired instantly by looking daggers and bricks at the good natured man.

Doctor Z., however, quietly turned his back to the fire, putting his coat-tails aside, American fashion, and very composedly whistling Yankee Doodle.

At length some one cleared to remark—"Must be a good morning for rabbit hunting."

"Yes," said the doctor, catching eagerly at the very hint he had been waiting for; "yes, I should think so. I'm going myself, directly. Just bought a pound or two of first rate powder over the way here. Finest article I've seen in town."

And carefully taking out the package, he took off a corner, as if at random, and peering upon his hand about a spoonful of the apparent contents, threw it upon the fire.

The explosion elevated some half-a-dozen of the circle (who had not noticed what he was doing) two or three feet from their seats, and loud remonstrances followed against the repetition of any chemical experiments of that sort; while the landlord, who had got his cue, remarked:

"By George! you'd better blow a man's house up, lady'n you!"

"If you say much, I will," rejoined Z, in great apparent heat. "I'd just as soon pitch the whole two pounds into the fire as not."

"I'd like to see you," replied M., confidently.

"Do you dare me to do it?" shouted Z.

"Yes, I do," doggedly answered the landlord.

No sooner said than done. With a muttered remark about "taking a dare" from any man, Z. dashed the bundle among the blazing brands and sprang towards the door, followed by the landlord.

"Heavens and earth, he's actually scattering! No sooner had he, (what speaks volumes,) stopped to shove back his chair—everything turned a complete somersat; and gathering themselves up as quickly as they could disentangle arms and legs from the confused mass, every body shot for the doors and windows, without stopping to look behind him.

One man, whose pluck had been tried on ordinary occasions, vanished through the back door jamged a five foot fence without breaking his trot, and was last seen streaking it down a back street, yelling murder at the top of his voice, and once in a while looking up backward, to dodge the falling timbers.

Another long-legged individual, who is built up like a pair of tongs, made but three strides across a sixty foot street, and landed up in a lane, leaning forward at an angle of about 45 degrees, putting down his long spars like the buckets of a steamboat wheel, with his coat tails streaming behind him like the tail of a comet.

While one courageous citizen, perceiving both doors and windows hopelessly wedged, scrambled behind a door and commenced praying most devoutly; but being rather more familiar with any other sort of composition than the Lord's Prayer, he was heard vociferating in tones of most energetic devotion—

"Now I lay me down to sleep," &c.

To this day, if you talk of "rabbit hunting" to any of those concerned, he will take off his coat in two minutes.

A Fine Poem.

THE BALLAD OF ROU."

FROM BLUNDER'S NEW NOVEL, "HAROLD."

I.

From Bloin to Senlis, wave by wave, roll'd on the Norman flood,
And Frank on Frank fought wear drifting down the weltering tide of blood.
There was not off in all the land a castle wall to fire,
And not a wife but wailed a lord, a child but mourned a sire
To Charles the King, the shrived monks, the mailed barons flew.
While, shaking earth, behind them strode the thunder march of Rou.

2.

"Oh, King," then cried three barons bold, "in vain are arms and mail.
We fall before the Norman axe, as corn before the hail"
"And verily," cried the pious monks, "by Mary's shrine we kneel,
For prayers, like arrows, glance aside, against the Norn as steel."
The barons sneered, the shavelings wept, while near and nearer drew,
As death-bells round their wrested feast, the raven flags of Rou.

3.

Then said King Charles, "Where thousands fall, what King can stand alone?
The strength of Kings is in the men that gather round the throne.
When war demays my barons bold, 'tis time for war to cease;
When Heaven forsakes my pious monks, the will of Heaven is peace
Go forth, my knights, with rose and rose and the Norman camp seek
And to the fold, with shepherd crook, entice the grisly Rou.

4.

"I'll give him all the ocean coast, from Michael Mount to Eure,
And Gisle, my child, shall be his bride, to bind him fast and sure.
Let him but be the Christian serve and slumber no heathen sword,
And half the lands I cannot keep, a fief from Charles, hot lord."
Forth went the Pastor of the Church, the Shepherd's work to do,
And wrap the golden fleece around the tiger lair of Rou.

5.

Predamnbulating earlier the chosen monks within the camp of dread
Amidst his warriors, Norman Rou stood taller by the head.
Out spoke the Frank Archbishop then, a priest devoid and sage,
"Where power and plenty wait thy word, what need of war and rage?
Why wrest a land so fair, so sight beneath the arches of blue,
Which might be thine to wife and rest? Thus said the King to Rou.

6.

"I'll give thee all the ocean coast, from Michael Mount to Eure,
And Gisle, my lateral child, as bride, to bind thee fast and sure;
If thou but bend to Christ, our God, and slumber thy paynim sword,
And bind thy land, the Church's son, a fief from Charles, thy lord."
The Norman's on his warriors looked—to counsel they withdrew;
The saints took pity on the Franks, and moved the soul of Rou.

7.

So back he strode, and then he spoke, to that assembled host
"I take the land thy King bestows, from Eure to Michael-land,
I take the maid, or foul or fair, a bargain with the coast,
And for thy creed, a sou-king's gods are those that gave the host.
So see thou back, and tell thy chief to make his proffer true,
And he shall find a double son, and yet a saint in Rou."

8.

So o'er the border stream of Epte came Rou the Norman wave,
Begirt with barons set the King, enthroned at green St. Clair;
He placed his hand in Charles' hand, loud shouted all his men
Save in King Charles eyes—the grip of Rou was strong.
"Now kiss the foot," the bishop said. "thy homage Norman wave,
Then dark the frown and clear the smile of that gran conquer, Rou.

9.

He takes the foot, as if the foot to earth rife to bring
The Norman vassal; he rise the throne and half wave into the King
Loud sneak the pagan Norman men—pale stare the Frank aghast
And Rou lifts up his head, as from the wind springs up the mast.
"I said I would adore a God, but not a mortal foot
The foot that fled before a foe, let outward's kiss" said Rou 10.

"Rou—the name given by the French to Rollo, or Hollo ganger, the founder of the Normans settlement.

NAPOLEON'S VETERANS.

A correspondent of the Boston Atlas, writing from Paris, describes the following scene:

A strange and ghostly spectacle came athwart our gay and busy streets, on the anniversary of the death of the Emperor Napoleon. The fine sensitive feelings of that great army, round and whole enough to walk, even mind beneath the columns of the Place Vendome, and repaired in procession to the Invalides, to celebrate mass in honor of his name. I cannot describe to you the effect of this assemblage of wide-sleeved coats, attired in the uniforms of the regiments to which they had belonged. It seems as if each had issued from the tomb, or risen from the battle-field, wherein they had once been left rotting in the sun or stiffening in the snow. The procession passed without exciting the slightest enthusiasm, the crowd followed it in silence and in awe. The church was hung with black, and the places round the altar reserved for the veterans of the Guard, of whom three-and-twenty yet remain. The celebrated Ney, whose jaw was shot away in seeking to place himself before the Emperor, in a skirmish in Russia, acted as sacristan, and his "silver jaw bone," fresh polished for the occasion, shone and glittered in the sun, while the Marechal Fradin, without legs, and in possession of but one eye, claimed the honor of holding the chief taper. Altogether, it was one of the most nervous and extraordinary ceremonies I ever witnessed.

For the Young.

RESOLUTION OVERCOMES OBSTACLES.

"The slothful say—the earth. There is a lion without. I shall be slain in the streets."—Prov. 22, 13.

Youth is naturally impatient. It has never enough than perseverance. It is prone to idolize genius, and to despise patient, plodding industry. It wants to accomplish, in a short period, enterprises which require much time; and to effect, by one brilliant achievement, objects which cost others many painful efforts.

But this is contrary to the law of God's government. In the natural world, things do not come to maturity in a single day. The river must wind its long course—must struggle through mountains—and dash over cataracts, before it sleeps on the bosom of the ocean. The tree must bear the blasts of winter, and be often agitated by the tempest, before it spreads wide its branches, and enriches the earth with its fruits. The harvest does not wave its golden locks, the moment after the young grain springs forth from the ground. There is first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear.

So it is in the moral world. All that is great, and noble, and lasting, is the result of time, and persevering resolution. He who expects it will be otherwise, in his case, will be miserably disappointed. He may have courage to grapple with the greatest difficulties, for a moment, but if he has not resolution to struggle with them as long as they stand in his path, he must be content with obscurity. If, because it is a long process to gain a reputation, and he, therefore, sits down and shrinks back from effort, and says, "There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets," he is not destined to fill a high station while he lives, or to be long remembered when he is dead.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

TARQUIN, THE TARTAR.—There was no feature in the character of Tarquin more remarkable than his great perseverance. No difficulties ever led him to give up what he had once undertaken, and he often persisted in his efforts under such circumstances as led all around him to think him insane. He made, on occasions, to relate to his friends an anecdote of his early life. "I once," said he, "was forced to take shelter from my enemies in a ruined building, where I sat alone for many hours. Desiring to divert my mind from my hopeless condition, I fixed my observation on a little ant that was carrying a grain of corn, larger than itself, up a high wall. I numbered the efforts it made to accomplish this object. The grain fell sixty nine times to the ground; but the ant persevered, and the seventieth time it reached the top. Shame, this sight," said Tarquin, "gave me courage at the moment, and I have never forgotten the lesson it conveyed."

THE SCOTTISH BOY.—Edmund Stone was born one hundred and thirty years ago, in Scotland. Edmund's father was gardner to the Duke of Argyle. This nobleman one day found on the grass a volume of Newton's Principia, in Latin; and when he made inquiries, learned that it belonged to young Edmund. He was much astonished to find that his gardener's son could read Latin, or understand mathematics. He said to him, "But how came you by a knowledge of all these things?" "A servant," said the youth, who was then in his eighteenth year, "taught me to read ten years ago. Does one need to know any more than the twenty-four letters, in order to learn every thing else that one wishes?" The Duke was still more surprised; he sat down upon a bank, and received from Edmund the following account:

"I first learned to read," said he, "when the stations were at work upon your house. I applied to them one day, and observed that the architect used a rule and compass, and that he made calculations. I inquired what might be the meaning and use of these things, when I was informed that there was a science called arithmetic, and I learned it. I was told there was another science called geometry; I bought the necessary books, and I learned geometry. By reading I found that there were good books in these two sciences in Latin; I bought a dictionary, and I learned Latin. I understood also, that there were good treatises upon the same kind in French; I bought a dictionary, and I learned French. And then, my lord, is what I have done: it seems to me that we may learn every thing when we know the twenty-four letters of the alphabet. This man after made beautiful mathematical instruments, and published a number of mathematical works.

WILLIAM GIFFORD.—William Gifford, the late learned editor of the Quarterly Review, was first a tailor boy on a coal vessel, and then a shoemaker. He used to lamp mending his shoes, and making shoes; and having no pen or paper, he laid out pieces of leather as smooth as possible, and wrought his problems on them with a blunted awl In the same way he used to write verses. He afterwards became one of the most celebrated scholars.—Rev. Hosea Hardin.

Selected Articles.

REASONING POWERS OF THE DOG

MR. EDITOR:—A vast amount of nonsense has been written, by would-be philosophers, in trying to deprive animals of the use and power of reason. The same operations, which they call reasoning in the human species, they call the results of instinct in the animal. Just as if the Almighty would not make the animal with the power of reasoning, if that power were necessary, in any respect, to the purpose for which the animal was brought into existence. I will give you an instance of the actions of a dog, and leave itself sages to give it what name they please.

Some years since, in the town of New-Boston, New Hampshire, there was an elderly woman who was alone, a convenient manner. A partition was made by nailing slats across in the front of the room, which was the usual living room of the family, and a door of timber provided. Here she was constantly confined. A shower coming up, all the members of the family, women as well as men, went out in a field adjoining the house to assist in raking and getting in hay. A window was just open, and the cow was in the barnyard—believe, a fall or cross of the Shepherd's dog.

The family had been baking, and had thrown a large quantity of coals from the oven into the large fire place. The people in the field heard the dog howling most dolefully, and looking up to the open window, in such apparent distress as to want of assistance, that they concluded that something was wrong at the house; they accordingly dispatched one of their number to see what the trouble was with the dog. The person came up, and looking in at the window, witnessed the dog's operations.

The mad woman had got out of her pen, and thrown the coals about the room. They set fire to the floor. The dog would get hold of the woman and pull her away from the fire place, and would then touch the coals to the hearth with his paws, and put out the blaze on the floor, while he was doing this, the woman would get to the fireplace, and scatter out the coals again. Again he would pull her away, and then go to work in behalf of the floor and put out the fire. This dog had had more work to do—explain than he could performs, the fire kindling in so many places, in gaining entrance at the window, and called for assistance. The person entered the house, rescued the woman, swept up the coals, put out the fire and returned to his work.

Now, instinct would have taught the dog to make his escape from a burning building; knowing that this woman was crazy—knowing that she was doing some fire—knowing that she would burn the house—and finding that he could not manage the affair, but thinking that the neighbors could; calling for their assistance, and giving them notice of the danger, knew very much like what these same folks call Reasoning, or would you take it, it is more than I can say a human being.—New York Spirit of the Times.

AMERICAN REAL LIFE.

Many thousand farmers in New England and other States, raise large dominos, pay all their debts and leave promptly, live independently, well clothed and comfortably housed and provided for, and lay up money, on farms of fifty acres. With them there is a place for everything, and everything in its place. Their horses and cattle, tools and implements are attended to with clock like regularity. Nothing is put off till to-morrow, that can be done to day. Economy is wealth, and system affords ease. These men are seldom in a hurry, except in harvest time, when they rise before sunrise, or across weather, which forbids employment out of doors, one makes corn browse, another shoes, a third is a carpenter, cooper or tailor, and one mounts upon another sleeves, and mother bakes a Pale leaf bake." And the females then occupied are among the most healthy and cheerful in the world.

A rural life is not only the most happy and virtuous, but the most comfortable. Rural villages containing all necessary manufacturing conpiny ments, are the very soul of our Republic. A machine compact, cheap and simple for spinning in a family to equal the throstle or mule, and a loom for weaving, like Cromwell's, so every farm house, would soon make and in large cities. What does the most wealthy man get for all his riches but food and clothing, and could clothing be made by some cheap and simple machine in every family, what great resources would every farmer of fifty acres possess within his own household.—Sonnets.

OBEYING ORDERS.

While lying in a Southern port some years since, the master of a vessel belonged to New England, smoked her out for the purpose of destroying rats The next morning about a dozen of these long-tailed gentry were found and brought on deck.—Their fat and sleek appearance evinced that they had been well cared for by themselves, if not by others. The steward came aft, and pointing to the heap, inquired of the captain what should be done with them.

"Done with them?" responded the captain, who was something of a wag, "why, make them into a stew."

Nothing more was said by either party on the subject at the time. Several gentlemen had been invited on board to dine upon squassets, which the captain and a friend, who was a good marksman, had "bracked" the day before. Dinner was served up in good style, and the appetites of all did justice in the fare; but most of the party preferred them made into a stew to any other way.

"Steward," exclaimed the captain, as he was changing the dishes preparatory to setting on the entry, "can't you give us just such a stew to morrow? You know there are some of the squirrels left."

"Didn't make dat out oh squirrels, sir," replied the African, with a hesitating attempt to smile, for which was kept back by a slight tremor.

"What then?" inquired the captain, quickly.

"Why, sir, de de rats, as you ordered me to."

A SCENE IN A PARISIAN FEMALE CLUB.

The feminine of Paris, who are so very anxious to emancipate themselves from their imaginary bondage, and who have established a club for the purpose of raising funds to prosecute their enterprise, and disease their rights; have as yet been rather unfortunate, as the movement does not appear to be very popular with the other sex, who attend their meetings, and by their disorderly proceedings break them up. Various scenes have been adopted to prevent this, but without success; and the last step was to raise the price of admission from twenty sous to two francs, and in order to induce a numerous attendance of the better class of men they proposed would be attracted, a notice was issued that at the next meeting the question of divorce would be discussed.

Seven ladies occupied the stand, three with their hair tastefully arranged and no bonnets; two wore bonnets of the most elegant description, and two had black hats. The session was opened after the manner of other public bodies, when a gentleman mounted the tribune, and produced a voluminous manuscript. Immediately some opposition was manifested.

"We don't want men," cried the malcontents.

The orator, however, proceeded with the first sentence of his discourse, but was compelled to give up, and quitted the tribune. Another one took his place, but shared a similar fate; and at length the President came forward, and there was a profound silence. She stated that the order of the day announced several orators, and not one appeared.

"It is an abuse of confidence," they shouted; "we are in a female club, and we want to hear females—down with the men."

Upon this, one of the bonnetted ladies came forward, and was loudly applauded. She severely rebuked the disturbers.

"Very good," they replied, "we take the lecture, but speak about divorce."

The lady threw at them a mingled look of indignation and contempt, and descended with a superb authority of Juno herself.

"Gentlemen," said another of the ladies, "we cannot satisfy you—we have not prepared a discourse."

"Never mind, go on."

"It is impossible, without preparation."

"We won't be particular—improvise."

The Presidentess again came forward. "Is there in this honorable society, a lady who wishes to speak on divorce."

There was profound silence—but at length the noise recommenced, and the Presidentess became so frightened, that the hurried off with her counsellors, and disappeared through a back door. The audience subsequently became so riotous that a company of "guard mobile" was called in, who dispersed them at the point of the bayonet.

The saloon in which the meetings were held has been given up, and the Mercure Etre, in the Chaussee d'Antin has been secured; but a commissary of police lately appeared there, and informed the Presidentess of the sad necessity of performing a painful duty; to invite her not to continue the exposition of her premature doctrines; whereupon Citizen Hippolyte Bonnelier succeeded the tribune and protested energetically against this attempt to enchain liberty; but it was decided to suspend the meetings, and Mme. Niboyet, the Presidentess has declared, that for the future, no man will be admitted, unless they are accompanied by a mother or sister, so that those who are not blessed with such a relative, must be excluded.—Inland City.

A PARISIAN DEMOCRAT.

In one of those paradises of love, silk, gilding and tapestry, which, with so much genius, are erected by architects, upholsterers and writers of romances—at that hour of tender melancholy, when the veiled lamp throws only silvery rays over curtains and sofas—at the moment when Juliet, or Romeo and Juliet, recommenced, for one time more, the saying over, amid sighs and murmurs, their adorable nothings-at-all.

"It is true, then," said Juliet, pressing her hands, blue veins and all, through the blood red ears of the young man, "it is indeed true that nothing on earth could make you cease to love me?"

"Oh—thrice oh, no!" cried the youth with a trembling voice, "not even despair, not even madness, not even crime."

"But—but?"—hesitatingly enquired the charming one, "if I were to subject your love, now, to a terrible proof?"

"Speak! speak!" he said, "try me by whatever it be—I will undergo it without blenching or hesitation."

"Well, then," she resumed—"for it is arguish to have a secret from the half of one's soul—I have long sched to avow it to you, and I will do it now—for I know that you love me."

Here the task of the narrator becomes difficult.)

As the confiding accents died upon her lipper lips of roses—Juliet opened wider that blushing vestibule to an inner gate of pearls—only somewhat whiter than pearls—and pushed there, with trembling thumb and prodactly finger, three teeth (how name it without rebellion in the ink a false tooth! And instantly the flush of timidity and shame deepened to purple the vermilion of her cheeks.

Romeo's expressive countenance underwent a slight decrease of happiness, but, gathering himself together with a slight effort, he said—"Oh, my angel beloved! you were indeed capable of believing that for this—this additional—I could cease to love you?"

"And it is not? And now I can venture to tell you all? Oh, noble as beautiful, you have loved me for myself!"

And with the same hand, blanched and delicate, and with the grace of a fairy cutting a cupful from a drop of dew, Juliet took out, from her dangling locks—an artificial eye!

The ardent lover fell into a profound reverie, and for some seconds sat in an utter silence. He then rose and took his hat.

"Oh, Heaven! what would you do?" exclaimed Juliet, with a convulsive sob.

Romeo stepped forward and kissed—gingerly—her snow white hand. "I but you adore," he said. "You see I am a true democrat, and it is necessary to be blind to see what should be, like the Republic, one and indivisible!"

A CHAPTER OF DEFINITIONS.

LOVE.—The electric spark communicating between two human galvanic batteries.

FAITH.—The rock upon which knowledge is built.

POETRY.—The language in which the Book of Nature is written—those who can translate it are called poets.

TRUTH.—A moral diamond, upon which the file of falsehood wastes itself without making an impression.

WEALTH.—The sum which gives content, whether one dollar or a million.

HAPPINESS.—A butterfly, which, when pursued, seems always just beyond your grasp, but if you sit down quietly, may alight upon you.

RELIGION.—Light from Heaven, which, if we did not observe it with a veil of sin, would dispense such radiance as would cause it blue to cease to eyes in physical light for its enjoyment.

HOPE.—A mariner, sailing on the ocean, of great sea, condensed so as to be perceptible to the senses of the multitude.

LIFE.—A masked ball, where, in struggling through the crowd, and trying to penetrate the disguise of our neighbor, we use up to forget our own selves, until the waning lights warn us of the time to depart.

EXPERIENCE.—A looking-glass, which we will not believe reflects our own destiny, until we have bought it.

HONOR.—A suit of armor, which cannot be too carefully guarded, for a breach may leave a stain behind the power of man to remove.

BEAUTY.—A sun which dwells in the souls of all, but shining through different mediums, does not always throw the same light upon the same objects.

TRUTHS.—The telescope searchings of a mind not content with viewing the phases of life only in outline and from a distance.

CATARACT.—Light, which, while striking its rays into another, is silently cooling its folds around the propagator, ready to turn upon him.

HOPE.—A Phœnix singing upon its funeral pile.

Wit and Humor.

THE REPENTANT LOVER.—Dear ———, when reading on a living in the country, had occasion, one day, to unite a rustic couple in the bonds of matrimony. The ceremony being over, the bridegroom began "to ask a friend" and falling (as some bashfuls might do) into a fit of repentance, he said,

"Your reverence has tied the knot tightly, I fancy; but, under favor, may I ask your reverence, if so be you could untie it again?"

"Why, no," replied the dean, "we never do that on this part of the country, my friend."

"Where, then?" cried the man, eagerly.

"On that!" pointing to the burial ground.

THE NEW FASHION.—"What's the news, today?" inquired Mrs. Moreland, dropping her spectacles, as her husband came in.

"The reign of petticoats is over," was the reply. "I walked down Broadway, to-day," said Mr. M., "and didn't see a lady who wore more than four."

"Lal Mr. Moreland, how you talk!—do you mean to intimate that all ladies are leaving off their petticoats?"

"Not all of 'em, I hope—only about twelve out of scores."

HARD TO GET OUT OF.—Somebody tells of a man who went to market to dispose of his cattle, which naturally led to a conversation on the very common theme of "hard times."

"Yes," said the cattle dealer, with an air of pecuniness, "times are hard, and this is a hard world—and, in my opinion, very few will get out of it alive."

POWER OF FIGURE 9.

Set any given line of figures so that they can be reversed and one substracted from the other, as per example

```
 53231
 13035
 ------
 40196
```

Now you may strike out any one of the figures in the last line, and by